Heylin, or Heylyn, Peter, D.D., 1600-1662, a native of Burford, Oxfordshire, was educated at Hart Hall, and elected Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford; Rector of Hemmingford, Huntingdonshire, and Prob. of Westminster, Oct. 1631, and shortly afterwards Rector of Houghton; deprived during the Rebellion, but reinstated in all his ecclesiastical honours at the Restoration. Heylin pub. at least thirty-seven works,—theological, political, educational, historical, &c.—the most of which are now almost entirely forgotten. Among the principal are—1. Microcosmus; or, Description of the World, Oxon., 1622, 4to; 7th ed., improved, &c. by Edmund Bohan, 1703, fol. 2. A Help to English History, Lon., 1641, 4to. First pub. under the name of Rob. Hall, Gent. After several eds. had appeared, it was pub., brought down to 1773, by P. Wright, 1773, 8vo. 3. Hist. of the Sabbath, 1636, 4to. 4. Hist. of Episcopate, 1642, '57, 4to. First pub. under the name of Theop. Churchman. 5. Hist. of the Reformation of the Church of Scotland, 1644, '60, fol.

"A party writer, to be read with caution. He perverts and misrepresents."—Bickersteth's C. S.

6. Cyprianus Anglicus; or, The Life and Death of Archbishop Laud, 1644, '68, '71, fol.; Dubl., 1719, fol. 7. Relation of Two Journeys, the one into France, the other into some of the adjacent Islands, Lon., 1656, 4to. 8. France painted to the Life, 1657, 8vo. Anon. Falsely attributed to Heylin: see Athen. Oxon. 9. Examen Historicum, 1658, '59, 8vo. This is an attack upon histories by Thomas Fuller and Wm. Sanderson: see FULLER, THOMAS, p. 644. 10. Discovery and Removal of the Stumbling-Block of Disobedience and Rebellion, cunningly laid down in the Subject's Way by Calvin, 1658, 4to. 11. Certamen Epistolare, 1659, 8vo. 12. Declaration of the Judgment of the Western Churches in five Controverted Points, reproached in these late times by the name of Arminianism, 1660, 4to; 1673, 8vo. This involved the author in a controversy with some able writers. 13. Ecclesia Restaurata; or, The Hist. of the Reformation of the Church of England, 1661, '70, '74, fol. New ed., with Life of the Author by John Barnard, D.D. Edited for the Eccles. Hist. Society by James C. Robertson, Camb., 1819, 2 vols. 8vo. 14. Aerius Rodivivus; or, The Hist. of the Presbyterians from 1536 to 1647, Oxf., 1670, fol.; Lon., 1672, fol.

"Heylin, in his history of the Puritans and the Presbyterians, blackens them for political ends. He is the Spagnolet of history, delighting himself with horrors at which the painter himself must have started. He tells of their oppositions to monarchical and episcopal government, their innovations in the church, and their embroilments of the kingdom. The sword rages in their hands; treason, sacrilege, plunder; while 'more of the blood of Englishmen had poured like water within the space of four years, than had been shed in the civil wars of York and Lancaster in four centuries.'"—Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature.

15. The Voyage of France; or, A Complete Journey through France, [in 1625,] 1673, 8vo, 1679.

"This volume, however, we assure our readers, is of a most amusing description, and indicative of great reading and acquirements for the age at which it was written. It is full of the effervescence of young life and animal spirits. The air of France seems to have actually converted the author into a Frenchman, whose vivacity, point, and badinage, he seems to have imbibed. The very moment he touched the Gallic soil he cast away his canonicals, and became the most facetious and joyous of good fellows, the most lively of tourists."—Lon. Retrospect, III. 22-31, 1821.

16. Historical and Miscellaneous Tracts; collected by the Rev. George Vernon, with an Account of the Author's Life, 1631, fol. A New Life of Heylin, by his son-in-law, John Barnard, D.D., 1682, 12mo. See BARNARD, JOHN, p. 124; and for a particular account of the controversy between Barnard and Vernon, see Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature, article The Rival Biographers of Heylin. "He was a person endowed with singular gifts, of a sharp and pregnant wit, solid and clear judgment. Heywood, or Haywood, Mrs. Eliza, 1693?-1756, daughter of a London tradesman named Fowler, pub. a number of loose novels, which gave her a place in the Dunciad. Her late publications were of a less exceptionable character. Among the best-known of these mischievous productions are The Secret History of the present Intrigues of the Court of Caramania, 2d ed., Lon., 1727, 8vo; and The New Utopia. Her latter writings are—1. The Female Spectator, 4 vols. 2. Epistles for the Ladies, 2 vols. 3. Fortunate Foundling, 1 vol. 4. Adventures of Nature, 1 vol. 5. History of Betty Thoughtless, 4 vols. 6. Jenny and Jemmy Jessamy, 3 vols. 7. Invisible Spy, 2 vols. 8. Husband and Wife, 2 vols. 9. A Present for a Servant Maid, pamphlet. The above are all 12mo. She wrote several other works, and some plays. See Biog. Dramat.; The Tatler, with Notes; Bowles's ed. of Pope; Drake's Essays, vol. iv.

Heywood, Ellis, d. about 1572, a son of John Heywood, the dramatic poet, (poet,) was elected Fellow of All-Souls College in 1547, and subsequently became a Jesuit, and died at Louvain. He wrote a book in Italian, entitled Il Moro, Florence, 1556, 8vo.

"Contains a discourse, fancied to be in the house of Sir Tho. More, sometime L. Chan. of England, and in consultation with him."—Athen. Oxon., q. v.

Heywood, Jasper, 1535?-1598, Fellow of Merton College, a son of John Heywood, the dramatic poet, (poet,) trans. into English three tragedies of Seneca,—Thyestes, 1560, 12mo; Troas, 1560, 16mo, 1581, 4to; Hercules Furcens, 1561, '81, 4to,—and various Poems and Devices, some of which are printed in The Paradise of Dainty Devices, 1573, 4to. See Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon.; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.; Chalmers's Biog. Diet.

Heywood, John, d. 1565, Court Jester, and one of the earliest dramatic writers, a native of North Mims, near St. Alban's, educated at Oxford, was a great favourite with Henry VIII., and Queen Mary, his successor, on account of "the mirth and quickness of his conceits." On the death of Mary, fearing that his principles as a Roman Catholic would invite persecution, he retired to Mechlin, in Brabant, where he resided until his death. A collection of his works was pub. in 1562, 4to; also in 1556, '66, '76, '87, '98, all 4to. His longest production is a poem entitled The Spider and the Flie, 1556, 4to. This allegorical work—containing ninety-eight chapters in the octave stanza—is intended to vindicate the Roman Catholic administration, of which the author was an admirer. Queen Mary is represented by the maid with her broom, (the civil sword,) executing the commands of her master, (Christ,) and her mistress, (the Church.) The Flies are the Roman Catholics, and the Spiders are the Protestants. The author has not made his illustrations very clear; for Harrison declares

"One hath made a booke of the SPIDER and the FLIE, wherein he dealeth so profounde, and beyond all measure of skill, that neither he himselfe that made it, neither any one that readeth it, can reach unto the meaning thereof."—Description of Britaine; prefixed to Holinshed's Chronicle.

As a poet Heywood does not seem to have been more successful than as a theologian:

"Perhaps there never was so dull, so tedious and trifling an apologue; without fancy, meaning, or moral."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry.

This vol. is very rare, and has been sold at high prices. Of Heywood's poetical Dialogue, containing the number in effect of all the Proverbs in the English language, (1547, 8vo,) and his three quarto pamphlets, containing 600 epigrams, there were numerous editions before the year 1598, in which year appeared the last ed. of his Works, 4to. None of his dramatic works, which are six in number, extend beyond the limits of an interlude. Their titles are: 1. A Play between Johan the husband, Tyb the wife, and Sir Johan the priest, 1593, 4to. 2. A merry Play between the Pardoner and the Friar, the Curate and Neighbour Prat, 1593, 4to. 3. The Play called The Four P. P.; a newe and a very merry Interlude of a Palmer, a Pardoner, a Pycary, and a Pedlar, N. D. D. C., 4to. 4. A Play of Gentleness and Nobility, N. D., Int., 4to. 5. A Play of Love, Int., 1533, 4to. 6. A Play of the Weather, Int., 1553, 4to.

"His comedies, most of which appeared before the year 1634, are destitute of plot, humour, or character, and give us no very high opinion of the festivity of this agreeable companion. They consist of low incident and the language of ribaldry. But perfection must not be expected before its time. He is called our first writer of comedies. But those who say this speak without determinate ideas, and confound comedies with moralities and interludes. We will allow that he is among the first of our dramatists who drove the Bible from the stage and introduced representations of familiar life and popular manners. . . . His Epigrams, six hundred in number, are probably some of his jokes versified, and perhaps were often extemporaneous sallies, made and repeated in company. Wit and humour are ever found in proportion to the progress of politeness. The miserable drolleries and the contemptible quibbles with which these little pieces are pointed indicate the great want of refinement, not only in the composition, but in the conversation, of our ancestors. . . . Another of Heywood's works is a poem in long verse, entitled A Dialogue containing in effect the number of all the Proverbs in the English tongue compact in a matter concerning two marriages. . . . All the proverbs of the English language are here interwoven into a very silly comic tale."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

"Of John Heywood, the favourite jester of Henry the Eighth and his daughter Mary, and the intimate of Sir Thomas More, whose congenial humour may have mingled with his own, more table-talk and promptness at reply have been handed down to us than of any writer of the times. His quips, and quirks, and quibbles, are of his age, but his copious pleasantry still enlivens; these smoothed the brow of Henry, and relaxed the rigid muscles of the melancholy Mary."—Diarsali's Amenities of Literature.

Heywood, Nathaniel, 1633-1677, Minister at Ormskirk, Lancashire, brother of Oliver Heywood, and also a Non-conformist divine. Christ Displayed; being a series of Serms., 1679. Pub. by Oliver Heywood, his brother, who also wrote his Life. See Oliver Heywood's Works, ed. 1827, vol. i. 447.

Heywood, Oliver, 1629-1702, a Non-conformist divine, a native of Bolton, Lancashire, admitted of Trin. Coll., Camb., 1647; minister of Halifax, 1652; deprived at the Restoration. He wrote a number of serms., &c. His treatise entitled Life in God's Favour was reprinted by John Fawcett, D.D., who also wrote a Sketch of the author's Life, 1798, 8vo. His Life, by Rev. J. Hunter, was pub. in 1842, '44, 8vo; and in 1827 (5 vols. 8vo) appeared (by Vint) his Whole Works now first collected, revised and arranged; including some tracts exceedingly rare, and others from unpublished MSS.

"He [Serjeant Heywood] has not the talent of saying what he has to say quickly; nor is he aware that brevity is in writing what charity is to all other virtues. Righteousness is worth nothing without the one, nor authority without the other. But whoever will forgive this little defect will find, in all his productions, great learning, immaculate honesty, and the most scrupulous accuracy. Heywood, THOMAS, an actor, dramatic poet, and prose writer, temp. Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I., was a native of Lincolnshire, and a Fellow of Peter House, Cambridge. He tells us that there were no less than 220 plays in which he had "either an entire hand, or at the least a main finger," (Prof. to the English Traveller;) but of this large number only 23 have come down to us, and of these The Late Lancashire Witches was written in conjunction with R. Broom, and Fortune by Land and Sea in conjunction with Wm. Rowley. For a list of these plays and his other works, and criticisms upon a number of them, we refer the reader to Langbaine's Dramat. Poets; Winstanley's English Poets; Biog. Dramat.; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.; Censura Litteraria, vol. i.; Brit. Bibliographer, vol. i.; Restituta, vol. i. p. 240; Ellis's Specimens of Early English Poetry; Lamb's Specimens of Eng. Dramat. Poets; Haslitt's Lects. on the Dramatic Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth; Collier's Hist. of Eng. Poet., and his ed. of Heywood's Dramat. Works, pub. by the Shakespeare Society, 1850, &c.; Schlegel's Lects. on the Dramatic Art and Lit.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 924-927; Whipple's Essays and Reviews; *Lon. Retrospect. Among the best-known of his productions are the following: 1. The Rape of Lucrece; a Tragedy, 1608, 4to; 4th ed., 1830, 4to; 5th ed., 1638, 4to. "One of the most wild, irregular, and unaccountable productions of his age. Amongst the most extravagant buffoonery, we find sparks of genius which would do honour to any dramatist."—Lon. Retrospect. Rev., ubi supra.

2. An Apology for Actors, 1612, 4to. This is one of the best of his prose pieces. 3. A Women kilde with Kindnesse; a Play, Lon., 1617, 4to.

"The language is not much raised above that of comedy; but we can hardly rank a tale of guilt, sorrow, and death, in that dramatic category. It may be read with interest and approbation at this day, being quite free from extravagance either in manner or language,—the beetings in of our earlier dramatists,—and equally so from buffoonery. The subject resembles that of Kotzebue's drama, The Stranger, but is managed with a nobler tone of morality."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

"The winding up of this play is rather awkwardly managed, and the moral is, according to established usage, equivocal. It required only Frankford's reconciliation to his wife, as well as his forgiveness of her for the highest breach of matrimonial duty, to have made a Woman Killed with Kindness a complete counterpart of The Stranger. Heywood, however, was in that respect but half a Kotzebue."—Haslitt's Lects. on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth.

But Schlegel points out a wide disparity between the management of the two dramas thus compared: see his Lects. on the Dramatic Art and Lit.

"Heywood is a sort of prose Shakespeare. His scenes are to the full as natural and affecting. But we miss the poet,—that which in Shakespeare always appears out and above the surface of the nature. Heywood's characters in this play, for instance, his country gentleman, &c., are exactly what we see, but of the best kind of what we see, in life. Shakespeare makes us believe, while we are among his lovely creations, that they are nothing but what we are familiar with, as in dreams new things seem old; but we awake, and sigh for the difference."—CHARLES LAMB: Specimens of Eng. Dramat. Poets.

4. Nine Bookes of various History concerninge Women; inscribed by ye names of ye nine Muses, 1624, fol. This is a very amusing book, and exhibits no little learning upon the subject discussed.

"In this singular and scarce volume occurs a double version of the Enigma assigned to Cleobulus of Lindus." See Brunk's Analecta.

5. England's Elizabeth; her Life and Troubles during her Minority, from the Cradle to the Crown, 1631, 12mo; 1632, '41, 12mo. This ed. is reprinted in the Harleian Miscellany.

6. The English Traveller; a Tragi-Comedy, 1633, 4to. "This play is written in verse, and with that ease and perspicuity, seldom rising to passion or figurative poetry, which distinguishes this dramatist. . . . The underplot of this play is largely borrowed from the Mostellaria of Plautus, and is diverting, though somewhat absurd."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

"Heywood's preface to this play is interesting, as it shows the heroic indifference about the opinion of posterity which some of these great writers seem to have felt. There is a magnanimity in authorship as in every thing else. His ambition seems to have been confined to the pleasure of hearing the players speak his lines while he lived. It does not appear that he ever contemplated the possibility of being read by after-ages. What a slender pittance of fame was motive sufficient to the production of such plays as the English Traveller, The Challenge for Beauty, and the Woman Killed with Kindness! Posterity is bound to take care that a writer loses nothing by such a noble modesty."—CHARLES LAMB: ubi supra.

"A production which abounds with good scenes, good writing, and excellent sentiment, and is distinguished by pure, gentle, and attractive characters."—Retrospect. Rev., ubi supra.

7. The Late Lancashire Witches; a Comedy, 1634, 4to, by R. Heywood and R. Broom. 8. The Hierarchy of the Blessed Angels; their Names, Orders, and Offices: the Fall of Lucifer with his Angels, 1635, fol.

"Heywood has been called a Prose Shakespeare for his dramas, which are indeed touching pictures of plain, homely, Swedish feelings, that make us more intimately acquainted with the life and practical morals of our ancestors than the more intellectual productions of his compere can possibly do. I am afraid his Hierarchy of Angels will scarce entitle him to be called a Prose Milton; yet it is sufficiently curious to merit preservation."—Blackw. Mag.

The Hierarchy of the Blessed Angels was a great favourite of Sir Walter Scott, who often refers to it. 9. A Challenge for Beauty; a Tragi-Comedy, 1636, 4to.

"Full of action and interest, and possesses a great variety of well-discriminated characters. . . . There is great vivacity in this performance, and sometimes considerable smartness of repartee."—Retrospect. Rev., ubi supra.

10. Love's Maistresse; or, The Queen's Masque, 1636, 4to. 11. The Royall King and the Loyall Subject; a Tragi-Comedy, 1637, 4to. Beaumont's Loyal Subject was greatly indebted to the plot of this piece: see Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe. 12. The General History of Women, 1667, 8vo. A number of Heywood's pieces have been repub. in Dodsley's and other Collections; several have been edited for the Shakespeare Society by Barron Field; and Mr. Collier has edited Heywood's Dramatic Works for the same association.

"Heywood I shall mention next, as a direct contrast to Marlowe in every thing but the smoothness of his verse. As Marlowe's imagination glows like a furnace, Heywood's is a gentle, lambent flame, that purifies without consuming. His manner is simplicity itself. There is nothing supernatural, nothing startling or terrific. He makes use of the commonest circumstances of every-day life, and of the easiest tempera, to show the workings, or rather the inefficacy, of the passions,—the vis inertia of tragedy."—HALLAM.

"Heywood seldom rises to much vigour of poetry; but his dramatic invention is ready, his style is easy, his characters do not transgress the boundaries of nature, and it is not surprising that he was popular in his age."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

"Heywood's best comedies are distinguished by a peculiar air, a superior manner; his gentlemen are the most reduced in their nice sense of the true and beautiful, their fine moral perception, and finished in the most scrupulous attention to polite manners; most exact in the observance of decorum without appearing rigorously correct; ductile as fused gold to which is good, and unamenable to that which is evil; men, in short, 'of most erected spirits.'"—Retrospect. Rev., ubi supra.

"Viewed in the light of a medical guide, it cannot fail to prove of great advantage as well to the professional student as to the general reader. We are now reluctantly compelled to leave this amusing and most instructive volume; but we cannot permit ourselves to finish our very imperfect review of it without recommending to our readers not only the book itself, but more particularly the principle upon which it is written,—the attempt to trace all spectral illusions to their physical cause."—British Critic.

Also highly commended by the New Monthly Mag.; Literary Gazette; Literary Chronicle; Scotsman; London Star. An interesting notice of it by "Christopher North" will be found in Notes Ambrosianæ, March, 1825; and see Dr. Shelton Mackenzie's note to his ed. of the Notes, N. York, 1855, vol. ii. 56.

Hichoch, Robert. See HITCHCOCK.

Hickeringill, Edmund, 1630-1708, educated at Cambridge, became a captain in the army, and, in 1662, Rector of All-Saints, Colchester. His belligerent spirit accompanied him into the church, to which he gave great offence by a number of "wild and scurrilous attacks" on Priestcraft, (1705, 4to,) &c. In 1707 he pub. a collection of Miscellaneous Tracts, Essays, Satyrs, &c. in Prose. Lon., 1707, 4to. In addition to his occasional sermons and pamphlets, he put forth, in 1660, 4to, Jamaica Viewed; also pub. in 1661, 1705, 4to, and included in his collection of Miscellaneous Tracts. The writer had spent some time in Jamaica. In 1716 there was pub. a 2d ed. of his Works, Oxf., 3 vols. 8vo. The editor says:

"The greatest writers of our times trembled at his pen; and, as great a genius as Sir Roger L'Estrange's was, it submitted to his superior way of reasoning."

But Newcourt treats him with less ceremony, and characterizes him as

Hickes, or Hicks, Gaspar. 4 Serms., Lon., 1644-45. See Athen. Oxon.

Hickes, George, D.D., 1642-1715, a native of New-ham, Yorkshire, entered St. John's College, Oxford, 1659; after the Restoration removed to Magdalen College, thence to Magdalen Hall, and in 1664 was chosen Fellow of Lincoln College; Rector of St. Ebbe's church, Oxford, about 1675; Vicar of All-Hallows Barking, London, 1680; Dean of Worcester, 1683; deprived on refusing to take the oath to William and Mary, 1689; consecrated Bishop of Thetford by the Nonjurors, 1694. Dr. Hickes was one of the most profoundly-learned men of his time, and of inflexible integrity of character. He pub. many controversial treatises on religion and politics, and some other works, (for a list of which see authorities cited below,) the most of which are now forgotten. The following are among the principal of his productions:—1. Jovian; or, an Answer to Johnson's Julian the Apostate, and Passive Obedience Defended, 1673, '83, 8vo. Anon.

"Wherein is showed that, notwithstanding this Doctrine of Non-resistance or Passive Obedience, we are secure enough of our Lives, properties, and religion."—Chap. xli.

2. The Spirit of Enthusiasm Exorcised; or, a Sermon on 1 Cor. xii. 4, Lon., 1681, '83, 4to; 4th ed., with addita., 1709, 8vo.

"A very learned and important discourse."—BISOP VAN MILDREY.

3. Institutiones Grammaticæ Anglo-Saxonice et Maso-Gothicæ, a G. Hickesio, Grammatica Islandica Runolphi Ionnæ. Catalogus Librorum Septentrionalium. Accedit Edwardi Bernardi Etymologium Britannicum, Oxon., 1689, 4to. A very valuable work.

"This book discovers an accuracy in this language beyond the attainments of any that had gone before him in that study, and will be of most necessary use to such as shall apply themselves to the right understanding of the ancient history and laws of this kingdom. But, as all first draughts of any sort are usually imperfect, so there seem to be some defects in it that might have been supplied. For example: there wanted a chapter of the variety of dialects, which might have been had out of the northern interlineary versions of the gospel, mentioned by Dr. Marshall; one whereof is peremptorily affirmed to have belonged to St. Cuthbert, as the other, in all likelihood, did to Venerable Bede."—Bishop Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib. See extract continued under No. 4.

4. Linguarum Veterum Septentrionalium Thesaurum Grammatico-Criticum et Archæologicum, 1703-05, 6 Parts, fol.: generally bound in two or three vols. Pub. at £3 3s.; large paper, £5 5s. Large-paper copies of this great work were sold at £15 formerly, but can now be had at from £5 to £6. Many portions of the work are taken from original Saxon MSS. now lost.

"Dr. Hickes, the great master of the Northern languages in general and of the Anglo-Saxon in particular, accomplished the most arduous task in compiling and publishing, amidst the hardships of deprivation and poverty, his famed Thesaurum Linguarum Veterum Septentrionalium."—DR. INGRAM.

"All these defects [vide ante] are now amply supplied by the great author in his Linguarum Vet. Septentrionalium Thesaurus Grammatico-Criticus et Archæologicus; which has had so many just praises given it, at home and abroad, that few English readers can be strangers to its contents."—BISOP NICOLSON: vide supra.

The bishop, referring to the Anglo-Saxon version of Bede's History of the Anglo-Saxon Church, declares that Dr. Hickes was "of all men now living the best able to give a character of the performance."—Ubi supra.

5. Several Letters which passed between Dr. G. Hickes and a Popish Priest, Lon., 1705, 8vo; 3d ed., 1727, 8vo. 6. A Second Collection of Letters rel. to the Ch. of Eng. and Ch. of Rome, 1710, 8vo, between Dr. Hickes and Lady Carew. The two collections were reprinted in 1715, 2 vols. 8vo.

"For a particular defence of our own Reformers against the cavils of Romish writers, see Abp. Land's Conference with Fisher, Lealle's Case stated between the Ch. of England and the Ch. of Rome, and Dr. Hickes's Letters to a Popish Priest. In these will be found a full refutation of the charges brought against our Reformers, and a complete vindication of them upon the soundest principles of church-unity and church-authority."—BISOP VAN MILDREY.

7. Two Treatises: one on the Christian Priesthood, the other Of the Dignity of the Episcopal Order, &c., 1707, '11, 8vo; 3d ed., with addita., 1711, 2 vols. 8vo; 4th ed., Oxon., 1847-48, 3 vols. 8vo. In Lib. of Anglo-Cath. Theol. 8. Serms., with a Pref. by N. Spinokes, 1713, 2 vols. 8vo. 9. Devotions in the Ancient Way of Offices Reformed, 1717, 8vo. New ed., 1846, sp. 8vo. The original of this was by John Austin, who died 1669: (see p. 83 of this Dictionary.) It was remodelled by Mrs. S. Hopton, and Dr. Hickes wrote a preface for the work thus revised. 10. Life of John Kettlewell, 1718, 8vo. 11. Serms., 1726, 8vo. Posth. See Biog. Brit., vol. vii., Supp.; Burnet's Own Times; Birch's Life of Tillotson; Letters by Eminent Persons, 1813, 3 vols. 8vo; Jones's Life of Bishop Horne; T. B. Macaulay's Hist. of Eng., vol. iii., 1856.

"A few other nonjurors ought to be particularly noticed. High among them in rank was George Hickes, Dean of Worcester. Of all the Englishmen of his time he was the most versed in the old Teutonic languages; and his knowledge of the early Christian literature was extensive. As to his capacity for political discussions, it may be sufficient to say that his favourite argument for passive obedience was drawn from the story of the Theban legion."—*T. B. Hickes, or Hicks, William, a captain apparently in the recruiting-service during the Civil War temp. Charles I. 1. Oxford Jest, 1669; enlarged, 1720, 12mo. This is called the first Jest-Book in the language. 2. Coffee-House Jest; 3d ed., 1684. 3. Oxford Drollery; being new poems and songs, 1679. Lloyd, £3 10s. 4. Grammatical Drollery; consisting of Poems and Songs. This is ascribed to Hickes, but without certainty. Bibl. Anglo-Poet., £5 5s.

"This Hicks, who was a sharking and indigent fellow while he lived in Oxon., and a great pretender to the art of dancing, (which he forsooth would sometimes teach,) was also author of Coffee-House Jest, the third edition of which came out in 1684, and of other trivial matters merely to get bread and make the pot walk."—Athen. Oxon.

Honest old Anthony seems to have held in great contempt those whose motto is

"Tenui musam meditatur avena:"—

"We cultivate literature upon a little oatmeal!"—or who employed their pen for the grovelling purpose of "making the pot walk."

Higden, Ranulph, or Ralph, d. 1360, aged between 80 and 90, a Benedictine of St. Werberg's Monastery in Chester, was the author of a Latin chronicle entitled Polychronicon. Dr. Gale pub. that part which relates to the Britons and Saxons among his Quindecem Scriptores, &c., (i. 177.) The Polychronicon was trans. into English by John de Trevisa in 1387, and from this Caxton made a version (adding an 8th book, or continuation from 1387 to 1460) and printed it in 1482, fol. A copy was sold at Dent's sale (Pt. 2, 143) for £103 19s. Reprinted by Wynken de Worde, with addits. and a Hymn in praise of History, 1495, fol. Again, by Peter Treveris, 1527, fol. The Polychronicon of Higden is divided into seven books. Book I. contains a description of countries in general, and especially of Britain; books ii.-vi. give us a Civil History from the Creation to temp. Edward III. The Chester Mysteries, exhibited in that city in 1328, have been ascribed to Higden; but this has been stoutly denied. See Bishop Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib.; Dibdin's Typ. Antiq.; *Dibdin's Lib. Nicolson treats Higden with little respect, and insists upon it that he stole his Polychronicon from Roger Costrensis's Polyeratica Temporum; but it has been charitably surmised that they both stole (or borrowed) from the same quarter. Their works are rather objects of curiosity than standards of an authoritative character.

See Lon. Gent. Mag., xcvi., ii. 151, 347. 3. Mohammed; or, the Illustrious, 1829, 8vo. This was reviewed with much severity by Edward Upham, author of The History of Buddhism. Mr. Upham says, "I know it to be full of errors." (Gent. Mag., Jan. 1830, pp. 9–14.) Mr. Higgins noticed Upham's letter in the next No. of the Magazine, and Mr. Upham continued the subject in the No. for March. 4. An Anacalypsis; an attempt to draw aside the Veil of the Saitic Isis, or An Inquiry into the Origin of Languages, Nations, and Religions, 1830, 2 vols. 4to. Posth. Privately printed. This work had been announced by Rev. Joseph Hunter, in his History of South Yorkshire, before Mr. Higgins's death.

"It occasionally happens that books written to display some peculiarity of system—or, as the wicked say, crotchets—of the author turn out to have a value of their own, from the very great number of well-indexed and well-referenced facts which they contain. We remember being much struck by seeing among the books of reference in the Museum Reading-room the Anacalypsis of Godfrey Higgins. Never was there more wilfulness of speculation than in this attempt to lift the veil of Isis. But thousands of statements, cited from all quarters, and very well indexed, apparently brought the book into such demand as made it convenient that it should be in the reading-room itself."—*Lon. Higginson, Francis, d. 1670? aged 54, son of the preceding, went to Europe, studied at Leyden, and became settled as a minister at Kirby-Steven, Westmoreland, England. He wrote against the Quakers, and pub. also a Latin theolog. treatise. See preceding article.

Higginson, John, 1616–1708, son of the first-named Francis Higginson, was a native of England, and accompanied his father to America in 1629. He was pastor of the church in Salem (formerly under charge of his father) from 1660 to 1708, and at the time of his death had been seventy-two years in the ministerial office. He pub. a number of serms., theolog. treatises, &c., 1663–1708, and a most eloquent attestation to Cotton Mather's Magnalia, which is thus warmly commended by one of the most learned students of American letters:

"John Higginson was one of the great men of New England, and incomparably the best writer, native or foreign, who lived in America during the first hundred years of her colonization. That portion of his attestation to the Magnalia which treats of the exodus of the Puritans has not been surpassed in strength and grandeur in all the orations ever delivered at Plymouth Rock, those of Webster and Everett not excepted."—Dr. R. He was also Master of Sherburn Hospital, and Prob. of Lincoln. Bishop Hildesley was descended from the royal family of England in the same line with Rev. Arthur Hildersham, and, like him, was noted for his piety and seal. It was under his auspices that the translation of the Holy Scriptures into the Manks language, begun by his predecessor, Bishop Wilson, was carried to completion. He also pub. the Book of Common Prayer and other works in the same language. As an author, he gave nothing to the world, save a small tract, pub. anonymously, entitled Plain Instructions for Young Persons in the Principles of the Christian Religion, in two Parts, 1762-67. Hildreth, Hosea, 1782-1835, a native of Chelmsford, Mass., graduated at Harvard College, 1803, was for some time Professor of Mathematics at Phillips Academy, Exeter, and for eight years pastor of the First Church in Gloucester, Mass. He pub. several serms., &c.

Hildreth, Richard, b. June 28, 1807, at Deerfield, Massachusetts, son of the preceding, graduated at Harvard College in 1826, was admitted to the Suffolk county (Boston) Bar in 1830, and commenced the practice of the law in Newburyport, in his native State. From July, 1832, to October, 1834, Mr. Hildreth was co-editor of the Boston Atlas, a daily newspaper, (of which he was also a joint founder), and again co-editor and Washington correspondent, May, 1836, to November, 1839. From October, 1834, to March, 1836, he resided in Florida, with a view to the improvement of his health, and, with the same object, resided from September, 1846, to September, 1847, in Demarara. During his abode in the latter place he edited successively The Guiana Chronicle and The Royal Gazette, (tri-weekly papers devoted to the support of the policy of the British Government in the abolition of slavery,) and edited, with an historical introduction, a compilation of the colonial laws of British Guiana. In addition to the works about to be noticed,—no inconsiderable evidence of great literary activity,—Mr. Hildreth has given to the world a number of pamphlets and miscellaneous articles in magazines and reviews, and edited several educational manuals and daily journals. He devotes his leisure moments to a continuation of his principal work,—the History of the United States,—which he designs to bring down (in two or more vols.) to the end of the administration of President Pierce.

In the advertisement prefixed to the first vol. of his history, Mr. Hildreth gives his reader to understand that he may expect to find a plain story told in a plain way:

"Of centennial sermons and Fourth-of-July orations, whether professedly such or in the guise of history, there are more than enough. It is due to our fathers and ourselves, it is due to truth and philosophy, to present for once, on the historic stage, the founders of our American nation undebased with patriotic rags, wrapped up in no fine-spun cloaks of excuses and apology, without stilt, buskins, tinsel, or bedizenment, in their own proper persons, often rude, hard, narrow, superstitious, and mistaken, but always earnest, downright, manly, and sincere. The result of their labours is eulogy enough: their best apology is to tell their story exactly as it was."

"If a plain and well-written narrative of public events, mostly in the order of their occurrence, without any attempt to generalize them, or to deduce from them broader lessons of experience, is all that constitutes a good history, then Mr. Hildreth's work deserves its name, and has fair claims to respectful notice. It is easy to see, however, that this is not all, and that history written on such a plan must needs be imperfect and unsatisfactory. . . . Nothing can be more cold and naked than his recital of any facts which are honourable to the memory of the first settlers of New England; if they do not occupy a very prominent place on the common record he forgets to mention them at all. When they are forced upon his notice he dismisses them as rapidly as possible. He has not a word of praise for their conscientiousness, their heroism, or their self-denial; though the first alone caused them to emigrate, so that it was the seminal principle of the New England colonies, while the second and third sustained their settlements through many years of danger and privation."—FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lixiii. 411-447: review of vols. I-IV.

"The author's style is bald and meagre in the extreme; and never once does he rise into any thing like fervour or exhibit the slightest capability of the graphic and picturesque. But the story is conscientiously—and, as far as details go, thoroughly—told. . . . The spirit in which the story is told is also remarkably fair. The Puritans—often rude, hard, narrow, superstitious, and mistaken, as Mr. Hildreth thinks them, 'but always earnest, downright, manly, and sincere'—are treated with ev'ning respect and liking; and only now and then, when in duty bound as a modern and an American,—as for example, in behalf of representative freedom, religious toleration, and such matters,—does the author put in any protest of his own."—Lon. Athenæum, 1850, pp. 13-15: review of vols. I-III.

Vols. iv. and v. are reviewed in the same periodical for Nov. 15, 1851, pp. 1191-1193; and vol. vi. in the No. for May 7, 1853. The reviewer, referring to the probability of Mr. Hildreth's continuation of his History, trusts that he will attend to the hints which he has given him, and dismisses the subject with the assurance that "It would be agreeable to have occasion to speak more favourably than we have been able conscientiously to do of the writings of a man of such industry and talent as Mr. Hildreth undoubtedly possesses."—p. 561, ubi supra.

"In this instance we encounter the name of American history descended from her stump, and recounting her narrative in a boy adapted to our own ears. For the first time, we believe, we have here the story of the founders of our New England colonies re-recorded in an ample and explicit manner, with a consistent care to exclude errors and exaggerations. . . . Animated by this spirit, Mr. Hildreth has availed himself, though hardly to the utmost, of his peculiar resources."—The Fathers of New England: Edin. Rev., Oct. 1855.

"We are confident that, when the merits of this history come to be known and appreciated, it will be extensively regarded as decidedly superior to any thing that before existed on American history, and as a valuable contribution to American authorship."—Bibliotheca Sacra.

"His work fills a want, and is therefore most welcome. Its positive merits, in addition to those we have before mentioned, are impartiality, steadiness of view, clear appreciation of character, and, in point of style, a terseness and conciseness not unlike Tacitus; with not a little, too, of Tacitean vigour of thought, stern sense of justice, sharp irony, and profound wisdom."—Methodist Quar. Rev.

"Mr. Hildreth is a bold and copious writer. His work is valuable for the immense amount of material it embodies."—De Bow's Review of the Southern States.

"The special merit of his work consists in the absence of whatever can possibly be deemed either irrelevant or ostentatious."—H. T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit.

"In this new work we notice the same calm and equal march of reason as in the History of America. Mr. Hildreth is never startling, never brilliant. His thought is like his style; solid, level, monotonous. It neither warms by its vividness nor startles by its boldness. It is pre-eminently respectable. As to ideas, there is little in this volume that can be called new. Mr. Hildreth is a republican, with a tendency, the full strength of which he unconsciously disguises from himself, towards Socialism."—Lon. Athenaeum, 1853, p. 1354.

And see HAWKS, FRANCIS LISTER, D.D., LL.D., No. 9, in this Dictionary.

"Mr. Hildreth's is a compilation, somewhat roughly executed, from the successive accounts of Japan by European and American writers. It is scarcely in any sense original, nor is it very systematic; but it may find acceptance as a manual of information on a subject of rising influence to both worlds. . . . Mr. Hildreth's historical sketch, though always readable, is disconnected and incomplete."—Lon. Athenaeum, 1856, pp. 835-836.

We hope at no distant day to welcome the remaining volumes of Mr. Hildreth's History of the United States; for, whatever faults the critic may discover in the historian's style, of the value of his elaborate array of facts there can be no question. If, as alleged, the faithful chronicler lack that philosophical insight which is requisite to give their proper value to the fruits of laborious researches, yet he has undoubtedly facilitated the execution of the duties of those who succeed him:—for, if "Felici qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas" be a true saying, it is as little to be denied that "Rerum ipsarum cognitio vera, e rebus ipsis est."

Hill, Miss. Novels, Lon., 1809-13.

Hill, Aaron, 1685-1750, an English poet, dramatist, and miscellaneous writer, a native of London, is better known to the present age from his quarrels with Pope than by his literary compositions. Among other works, he pub.—1. A History of the Ottoman Empire, 1709, fol. 2. Elfrid; a Trag., 1709. 3. Camillus; a Poem, 1709. 4, 5. Essays on Beech Oil, 1714-15, 8vo. 6. Essays on Coals and Grape-Wines, 1718, 8vo. 7. King Henry the Fifth; a Trag., 1723, 8vo. 8. The Northern Star; a Poem, 1725, 8vo. 9. Advice to the Poets, 1731, 4to. 10. The Impartial; a Poem. 11. The Progress of Wit; a Caveat for the use of an Eminent Writer, (a satire upon Pope, who had introduced Hill, rather in a complimentary manner, in the Dunciad.) 12. Merope; a Trag. from Voltaire, with alterations, 1749, 8vo. His Miscellaneous Works—a collection of his best pieces—were pub. in 1753, 4 vols. 8vo; and his Dramatic Works, (seventeen in all,) with his Life, appeared in 1759, 2 vols. 8vo. See Biog. Brit., Supp. vol. vii.; Biog. Dramat.; Cibber's Lives; Johnson's and Pope's Works; Davies's Life of Garrick; Richardson's Corresp.; Rufhead's Life of Pope; Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors.

We should not omit to state that our poet was—as the title of some of his works indicate—a dabbler in political economy and an extensive projector, and, like many other projectors of ancient times and our own days, displayed more enterprise than judgment.

The sentences of his critical abilities may be estimated from his verdict on Pope's poetry. He gravely assures us that the popularity of the author of the Rape of the Lock "Arose from meditated little personal asiduities, and a certain bladdery swell of management."

And he then gives utterance to this sagacious vaticination:

"But rest his memory in peace! It will very rarely be disturbed by that time he himself is in ashes."—Letter to Richardson, in Richardson's Correspondence.

But posterity have ventured to differ with Mr. Hill. Pope certainly was not wont to display much of a spirit of meekness in his literary controversies; but in his misunderstanding with Hill the latter appears the least amiable. His general character, however, was exemplary, and his manners mild and conciliating; but it is dangerous to tempt the amour-propre of an author, however his savoir en mode may prevail in the family circle and social reunion.

Pope's poetical offence was comprised in the following lines from the Dunciad, and they have been truly considered quite as complimentary as the reverse. Our author is introduced as one of the competitors for the prize of Dulness:

"Then Hill essay'd: scarce vanished out of sight,
He buoys up instant, and returns to light;
He bears no token of the sable stream,
And mounts far off, among the swans of Thames."

The satire here is indeed very slight; but, slight as it was, it was sufficient to disturb the equanimity of Master Hill.

"Professor Hill's lectures are admirable, and have been admitted to the first place among our systematic expositions of revealed truth."—Congreg. Mag.

"These lectures embrace the evidences, doctrines, duties, and institutions of Christianity. They are drawn up with great care and ability. . . . The author's tenets were in accordance with the Westminster Confession of Faith."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"Dr. Hill of St. Andrews had the faculty beyond most men of comprehensive and luminous arrangement. We shall have occasion at a posterior stage of our course to avail ourselves of the important service which he has rendered to theology. . . . I am not sure if I can recommend a more complete manual of divinity than the one I have now adverted to. . . . I know of no treatise which professes to exhibit the whole range of theological doctrine, and does it in more of a lucidus ordo than the one that we have fixed upon."—Dr. CHALMERS: Poeth. Works, vol. ix. p. xviii. 126; Preflections on Hill's Lectures.

Hill, George, an American poet, b. 1796, at Guilford, Conn., graduated at Yale College in 1816, and, after a term of public service under the United States Government, entered the navy in 1827 as a teacher of mathematics. He was subsequently Librarian of the Department of State at Washington, and United States Consul for the southern portion of Asia Minor. He is now attached to one of the Bureaus of the Department of State at Washington. Mr. Hill pub. anonymously, in 1834, The Ruins of Athens, with other Poems; and a second edit., entitled The Ruins of Athens, Titania's Banquet, a Masque, and other Poems, appeared in 1839, 8vo, with the author's name. Troubat, of the Phila. Bar, Phila., 1846, 8vo; 2d Amer. ed., with addit. notes, referring to American Cases, by Henry Wharton, of the Phila. Bar, 1854, 8vo. This excellent work furnished the basis of various parts of Mr. Spencer's unfinished work on Equity Jurisprudence.

"On examination of the sheets, it appears that the work has been enlarged by nearly one-half in bulk by the new matter of this edition; and that the table of cases shows an addition of more than three thousand decisions in England and the United States. The authorities, we believe, have been brought down to the latest moment."—Amer. Law Register, Dec. 1853.

The five serms. on 2 Kings iv. 26, entitled Faith's Estimate of Afflictive Dispensations, have been pub. separately ("It is well," &c.) by the London Religious Tract Society, 1853, 32mo. Hill's discourses are highly valued.

"Some admirable sermons, especially on affliction."—Bickersteth's C. S.

Hill, Sir John, M.D., 1716–1775, originally an apothecary, the son of Rev. Theophilus Hill, of Peterborough or Spalding, resided in London, and wrote many books on medicine, botany, natural philosophy, natural history, and a number of dramas, novels, &c. A detailed account of these many publications would be of but small interest to the modern reader, who knows but little of Sir John save his name, and this principally through his quarrels with the Royal Society, and with Garrick. He was a man of remarkable versatility of talent, but his moral character cannot be commended. Among his publications are—1. Orpheus; an Opera, 1740. 2. Theophrastus's Hist. of Stones; from the Greek, with Notes, 1746, '74, 8vo. 3. A Dissert. on Royal Societies. 4. Review of the Works of the Royal Society of London, Lon., 1751, 8vo, 4to:

"In which, by the most unfair quotations, mutilations, and misrepresentations, numbers of the papers read in that illustrious assembly, and published under the title of the Philosophical Transactions, are endeavoured to be rendered ridiculous."—Life of Hill: Chalmers's Biog. Diet.

5. Essays on Natural History and Philosophy, 1752, 8vo. Considered the best of his writings. 6. A General Natural History, 1748–52, 3 vols. fol. 7. Urania; or, a Complete View of the Heavens, 1754, 8vo. 8. The Critical Minute; a Farce, 1754. 9. The Route; a Farce, 1754. 10. The Gardener's New Kalendar, 1757, '58, 8vo. 11. Eden; or, a Complete Body of Gardening, 1757, fol. 12. The Sleep of Plants, 1757, '62, 12mo. 13. Naval Hist. of Great Britain, compiled from the papers of the late Capt. Geo. Berkeley, 1757, fol. 14. British Herbal, 1758, fol. 15. Construction of Nerves, 1758, 8vo. 16. An Idea of a Botanical Garden in England, 1758, 8vo. 17. Exotic Botany, 1759, fol. 18. The Vegetable System, 1759–76, 26 vols. fol. Contains 1600 engravings. Pub. at 38 guineas, plain; 160 guineas, coloured. Pub. under the patronage of the Earl of Bute. Hill presented a copy to the King of Sweden, who invested him with the order of the Polar Star, or Vasa. Henceforth he assumed the title of Sir John. 19. Flora Britannica, 1760, 8vo. 20. Family Practice of Physic, 1769, 8vo. 21. Hist. of Mr. Lovell; a Novel. This is a pretended autobiography. 22. Adventures of a Creole. 23. The Life of Lady Frail; a Novel. He was also joint-editor (with George Lewis Scott) of a Supplement to Chambers's Dictionary, and was connected with the British Magazine, The Inspector, &c. See Short Account of the Life, Writings, and Character of the late Sir John Hill, Edin., 1779, 8vo; Biog. Dramat.; Gent. "As to his literary character, and the rank of merit in which his writings ought to stand, Hill's greatest enemies could not deny that he was master of considerable abilities and an amazing quickness of parts. . . . A large volume might be written on the life and adventures of this extraordinary man, as affording a complete history of literary quackery, every branch of which he pursued with a greater contempt for character than perhaps any man in our time."—Life of Hill, in Chalmers's Biog. Diet.

"Dr. Hill was a very curious observer; and, if he would have been contented to tell the world no more than he knew, he might have been a very considerable man, and needed not to have recourse to such mean expedients to raise his reputation."—Dr. Johnson: Conversation with George III. see Boswell.

Hill, Sir Richard, 1733–1808, M.P. for Salop, a son of Sir Rowland Hill, Bart., a brother of the celebrated preacher, Rowland Hill, and uncle of General Lord Hill, Commander-in-chief R.N., was much attached to the doctrines of the Calvinist Methodists, and sometimes preached in their chapels. He pub. several theolog. treatises, 1775–1805, of which the best-known is An Apology for Brotherly Love, and for the Doctrines of the Church of England, Lon., 1798, 8vo. This is an answer to Daubeny's Guide to the Church. In 1800 he pub. Daubenism Confuted, &c., 8vo. See Rev. Edwin Sidney's Life of Sir Richard Hill, 1839, 8vo.

The Character of a Jew. 3. Criticisms on Job. The Rev. Joseph Spence took a lively interest in Hill, and promoted a subscription for his benefit by publishing a Parallel, in the manner of Plutarch, between a most celebrated Man of Florence (Sig. Magliabecchi) and one scarcely known in England, (Robert Hill,) Strawberry Hill, 1758. To this vol. we must refer the reader who desires to know more of the learned tailor.

Hill, Rowland, 1744–1833, an eminent preacher attached to the doctrines of the Calvinist Methodists, a brother of Sir Richard Hill, (ante,) was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and ordained deacon in the Church of England. In 1783 he built Surrey Chapel, London, and preached there during the winter seasons, acting as an itinerant preacher during the summer months until his death,—a period of fifty years. He pub. a number of serma., theological treatises, &c., of which the best-known is the work entitled Village Dialogues, of which the 34th ed. was pub. in 1839. He was a man of great benevolence, profound piety, and indefatigable zeal. See his Life, by the Rev. W. Jones, with a Pref. by Rev. James Sherman, Mr. Hill's successor in Surrey Chapel; 2d ed., 1840, 12mo; again, 1845; his Life, by Rev. Sheridan used to say,

"I go to hear Rowland Hill because his ideas come red-hot from the heart."

Dr. Milner, the Dean of Carlisle, was so much affected by hearing one of his sermons, that he went to him in the vestry, and said,

"Mr. Hill, Mr. Hill, I felt to-day 'tis this slap-dash preaching, say what they will, that does all the good."

Robert Southey gives an interesting account of a sermon he heard Hill deliver in 1823, two years before the preacher's death:

"His manner was animated and striking, sometimes impressive and dignified, always remarkable; and so powerful a voice I have rarely or never heard. . . . The purport of his sermon was good; nothing fanatical, nothing enthusiastic; and the Calvinism which it expressed was so qualified as to be harmless; . . . the manner that of a performer as great in his line as Kent or Kemble."—Letter to Mrs. Southey: Southey's Life and Correspondence.

Let us quote the testimony of a witness even more distinguished than Rowland Hill himself:

"No man has ever drawn, since the days of the Saviour, such sublime images from Nature: here Mr. Hill excels every other man! . . . Whatever a misjudging world may say, such men as these will 'shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars forever.' May my soul, though at a humble distance, be admitted among them!"—ROBERT HALL.

Hill, Wm., D.D., 1619-1677, a divine, school-master, and physician, Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, a native of Cudworth, Warwickshire. 1. Dionysii Orbis Descriptio, Lon., 1658, '59, '63, '78, 8vo. The last ed. is the best. 2. Woman's Looking-Glass, 1660, 12mo.

Hillard, George Stillman, a grandson of General Stillman, b. Sept. 22, 1808, at Machias, Maine, entered the Boston Latin School, 1822, entered Harvard College in 1824, and graduated in 1828, admitted to the Suffolk county (Boston) Bar, 1833, and to the present time (1856) has been engaged in the practice of the law in Boston. Mr. Hillard was married in 1834 to Susan T., daughter of the late Judge Howe of Northampton. In 1845 he was elected to the Common Council, of which he was a member until July, 1847, and was for six months its president. He has been a representative to the State Legislature, and was elected to the Senate in 1850. As a legislator, Mr. Hillard soon evinced abilities which elicited the warm commendation of the late Daniel Webster, (see Webster's Works, v. 356), whose estimate of intellectual character was seldom mistaken. The reader will find some interesting reminiscences of Mr. Hillard's early life in the Boston Book, 1850; and in Loring's Hundred Boston Orators.

Mr. Hillard has gained the reputation of being one of the most eloquent of American orators: as a writer, we have heard him classed, by no less an authority than the eminent publicist, Dr. Francis Lieber, among the very best which the country has yet produced. Mr. Hillard's publications are as follows:—1. Fourth of July Oration before the City Authorities of Boston, 1835. 2. Discourse before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, 1843. 3. Connection between Geography and History, 1846, 12mo. 4. Address before the Mercantile Library Association of Boston, 1850. 5. Address before the New York Pilgrim Society, 1851.

6. Eulogy on Daniel Webster, before the City Authorities of Boston, 1852. This truly eloquent oration will be found in A Memorial of Daniel Webster from the City of Boston, 1853, edit. by Mr. Hillard. This vol. must be owned by all who possess Little, Brown & Co.'s beautiful edit. of the Works of Webster. 7. Six Months in Italy, 1853, 2 vols. 12mo; 2d ed., 1854, 2 vols. 12mo; 5th ed., 1855, 16mo. This work has been commended in the highest terms. We give brief citations:

"The mass of information contained in these two volumes is immense; the criticisms novel, and, in our humble opinion, judicious; the writer's own thoughts and feelings beautifully expressed. . . . The only wonder is how he could manage in so short a time to see so much; for Mr. Hillard is one who sees not only with the outward eye, but with that inner mental vision which carries away with it and makes its own all that fixes its observation and acts upon its sensations. . . . Mr. Hillard is evidently a scholar, a man of taste and feeling, something, we should opine, of a poet, and unmistakably a gentleman."—Fraser's Magazine.

"Mr. Hillard's work is that of a scholar and a gentleman, a man of sense as well as of taste and feeling, and well prepared by his previous reading to appreciate his subject. He writes without egotism, personal or patriotic; he has no systems to support nor prejudices to defend; his views are always liberal and benevolent, and if not always, in our opinion, right, he is always candid. His style is pointed, and is full of happy expressions and striking images; occasionally it is to our taste a little too ambitious, and his illustrations, though ingenious, seem to us fanciful and far-fetched; the anxiety (perhaps derived from his profession) to enforce a point leads now and then to exaggeration,—not indeed of fact, but of expression. These blemishes, however, are but slight; and our mention of them must be taken as a proof of the sincerity of our general praise."—Lon. Quar. Rev., April, 1858.

"Taking up the book casually, it fixed our attention at once; and it is long since we have read a volume of travels with so much pleasure."—Dublin Review, July, 1858.

The New York Albion thus closes its review:

"What a pleasant business it would be, this passing judgment on books, if we had many such authors to deal with! It was with listless attention that we took up the two volumes before us, notwithstanding that these Boston publishers have the knack of courting the eye by all the tricky niceties of typography. But let no man gainsay the truth of that homely proverb which peoples ocean with as good fish as ever came out of it, or rashly assert that Italy is an exhausted theme! Mr. Hillard has fairly carried us with him from his first page to his last; and we must honestly avow that no modern traveller, within the scope of our pen, has looked and listened so profitably to himself and has recorded his impressions in a manner so acceptable to his readers."

8. A First-Class Reader; consisting of Extracts in Prose and Verse, with Biographical and Critical Notices of the Authors. For the use of Advanced Classes in Public and Private Schools, 1856, 8vo, pp. 504. This vol. contains 156 pieces, selected from the writings of 112 authors of note.

"The selections are so well made, and the brief biographical sketches so convenient, that the book deserves a circulation beyond the class for whom, ostensibly, it has been prepared. As a volume of 'elegant extracts,' we take pleasure in recommending it to the general reader; to the instructor we can safely endorse it, as a careful and judicious compilation, admirably adapted to the requirements of the higher schools."—(N. York) Criticism, April 5, 1856, 361.

Mr. Hillard has also prepared a Second, Third, and Fourth Class Reader, the whole forming a complete series for the use of grammar-schools. They are being generally used in most of the States of the Union.

Translator of—9. Guizot's Essay on the Character and Influence of Washington, 1840, 12mo. Editor of—10. The Poetical Works of Edmund Spenser, 1839, 5 vols. 12mo, with a critical Introduction. This excellent edit. was pub. by Little, Brown & Co. of Boston, who have issued a new edit. of Spenser's Works in 1855, 5 vols. 18mo. Mr. Hillard's edit. was thus commended by the distinguished historian of Spanish Literature:

"There is no doubt you have published the best edition of Spenser yet known. But you have, I think, done more than this: you have, it seems to me, published a positively good, useful, and agreeable edition of him; one that will cause him to be read and enjoyed by many classes of persons who would otherwise not have ventured to open his pages."—GEOFFREY THOMAS: Letter to the Publishers.

11. Selections from the Writings of Walter Savage Landor, 1856, 12mo, pp. 301.

"If, through the vestibule this little book offers, I can persuade the public to pass into the stately structure of wisdom and beauty which Landor has reared, my purpose will have been accomplished."—Preface.

"In his admirably-written preface, Mr. Hillard has given so excellent an estimate of Landor's works that he has forestalled the office of the critic; and we could say nothing on the subject that he has not said in a better manner than we could hope to do."—(N. York) Criticism, January 12, 1856, 160.

Mr. Hillard was for some time editor of the American Jurist, and wrote a number of articles for its pages; and he has also been a contributor to the North American Review, the Christian Examiner, the New England Magazine, &c. To him also we are indebted for the Life of Captain John Smith, in Sparks's Library of American Biography, 1st Series, ii. 171-407. If to all these titles to honourable distinction Mr. Hillard's friends should claim for him the possession of poetical abilities of no ordinary rank, they would feel amply prepared to vindicate the justice of their pretensions. Among the most admired of his writings are the two noticed with just commendation in the following extract:

"George S. Hillard is one of the most polished writers of New England. His taste is fastidious, and he is a fine rhetorician. He excels in arrangement and condensation, and has an imaginative expression. Of his numerous articles in The North American Review, one of the most brilliant is on Prescott's Conquest of Mexico; but I think the happiest of his essays is that on the Mission of the Poet, read before the Phi Beta Kappa Society."—R. W. GAINWOLD: The Intellectual History, Condition, and Prospects of the Century, prefixed to his Prose Writers of America.

"The exquisite and flowing sentences seem allied to music, and touch the outward sense, as well as stir the fancy and excite the reflective powers."

We have already quoted the testimonies of some eminent witnesses to the distinguished talents—in the maturity of their luxuriant foliage—of the subject of our notice. The early indications of these talents—the "promise of the spring"—were not unnoticed by one who first planted, and then stimulated to an abundant harvest, the priceless seeds of knowledge in many a youthful mind. We are adducing but one more to the many evidences of that sagacity which so pre-eminently characterised a late eminent jurist, by the citation of the following lines:

"To some among them [his law-pupils] he was bound by the warmest ties of affection; and I cannot refrain from mentioning the love and esteem he had for Charles Sumner and George S. Hillard, whom he rather looked upon as his children than as his pupils."—Wm. W. Story's Life of Judge Joseph Story, ii. 92.

Hilliard, Wm., M.D. Medical treatises, Lon., 1735-61. Hillhouse, James, 1754-1832, a native of Montville, Connecticut, graduated at Yale College, 1773; treasurer of Yale College, 1782-1832; member U. S. House of Representatives, 1791-94; of the United States Senate, 1794-1810. Mr. Hillhouse filled several important public posts in his native State. He pub. a number of Speeches, &c. See Bacon's Sketch of the Life and Character of Hon. James Hillhouse; Life and Letters of Judge Joseph Story, i. 158.

Hillhouse, James A., 1789-1841, son of the preceding, was a native of New Haven, Connecticut, entered Yale College at fifteen years of age, and graduated, with distinguished honours, in 1808. After the war of 1812 he engaged in commercial pursuits in the city of New York; visited Europe in 1819; was married in 1824 to Miss Cornelia Lawrence, of New York; and shortly afterwards removed to his country-seat of Sachem's Wood, near New Haven, where he resided, with the exception of annual visits to New York, during the remainder of his life. Upon taking his second degree at college, Mr. Hillhouse had gained great credit by his oration On the Education of a Poet; and in 1812 he produced a poem of remarkable excellence, entitled The Judgment, a Vision,—a description of the awful scenes of the Last Day. (Pub. N. York, 1812, 8vo.) This poem was rewarded, shortly after its first appearance, by the enthusiastic commendation of one of the most accomplished of English critics, who thus concludes his review:

"In short, such is the approach to excellence, both in the conception and execution of this little poem, that I confess myself more than commonly gratified in the opportunity of doing what lies in my power towards making it further known on this side the Atlantic; especially as the praise to which it is so justly entitled may, in all probability, lead its author to other and more extended efforts."—DR. DRAKE: Essays in Autumn, 1822, ii. 100-127.

Whilst in London, he pub. Percy's Masque, a Drama in Five Acts; the subject of which is "the successful attempt of one of the Percies, the son of Shakspeare's Hotspur, to recover his ancestral home." It was reprinted in New York, "with alterations," 1826, 12mo, pp. 150, and reviewed in the North American Review (xi. 384-393) by a fellow-poet, William C. Bryant. Referring the reader to this article, we will quote a few paragraphs:

"We are glad to meet with so respectable a production in this department of literature from the pen of a native writer; indeed, we are pleased to light upon any modern tragedy in the English language so well worthy of notice. . . . There is no powerful development of character, but the characters are consistent and well sustained. . . . We think that the author of Percy's Masque is to be congratulated on having escaped so well the florid and declamatory manner, with so many celebrated and seducing examples before him. We hope, however, that, should he continue to cultivate this department of the drama, he will be led to study a style still more idiomatic and easy, and, particularly (for here he has sinned most) with fewer capricious departures from the natural construction."

"Percy's Masque reproduces the features of an era more impressed with knightly character than any in the annals of England. Hillhouse moves in that atmosphere quite as gracefully as among the solemn and venerable traditions of the Hebrew faith. His dramatic and other pieces are the first instances in the country of artistic skill in the higher and more elaborate species of poetic writing."—H. T. TUCKERMAN'S Sketch of American Literature.

In 1824 Mr. Hillhouse composed the sacred drama of Hadad, which was given to the world in the following year, New York, 8vo, pp. 208. This admirable piece was reviewed in the North American Review (xxii. 13-27) by F. W. P. Greenwood; by H. Ware, Jr., in the Christian Examiner, ii. 301; and by an unknown critic, in the United States Literary Gazette, ii. 96. See also article on Hillhouse's Dramas, Discourses, and other Poems, (1839, 2 vols. 16mo,) by J. G. Palfrey, in North American Review, i. 231-262; and Literature in the Nineteenth Century—America—in the London Athenaeum, 1833, p. 9. The author of the article declares that "This is one of those works which the Americans do not or cannot appreciate. As a drama, it is throughout admirable, though the excessive interest of the supernatural vein rather dims the brightness of the inferior portions of the plot. . . . We trust he writes malgré discouragement and neglect, for the time will come when he will be sought for. Le bon temps for literature in America is not far off."

In 1839 Mr. Hillhouse pub. (in 2 vols. 16mo) a collective ed. of his writings, the title of which we have given above. The vols. contain—1. Percy's Masque. 2. Hadad. 3. Demetria; a domestic Italian tragedy, written in 1813, but never before printed. 4. The Judgment; a Poem. 5. Sachem's Wood; a Poem. 6. Phi Beta Kappa Discourse, 1826, at New Haven, On Some of the Considerations which should influence an Epic or a Tragic Writer in the Choice of an Era. 7. A Discourse before the Brooklyn Lyceum, in 1836, On the Relations of Literature to a Republican Government. 8. A Discourse at New Haven, 1834, in Commemoration of the Life and Services of General Lafayette. See the Review by J. G. Palfrey, noticed above; another review in the Boston Christian Examiner, xxvii. 285; articles (on the Poem of Judgment) in the Boston Christian Disciple, iii. 209; N. Haven Chris. M. Spec., iii. 466; an article in the N. Haven Chris. Quar. Spec., v. 233; New Englander, Nov. 1858, (by H. T. Tuckerman); N. P. Willis's Poem before the Lincolian Society of Yale College, 1841; Everett's Poets of Connecticut; notices of Hillhouse, from materials furnished by Bishop Kip, in Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America. The enthusiastic tribute of a fellow-poet may appropriately conclude this notice of one of the most eminent of modern dramatic authors:

"Hillhouse, whose music, like his themes,
Lifts earth to heaven,—whose poet-dreams
Are pure and holy as the hymn
Echoed from harps of seraphim,
By birds that drank at Zion's fountain,
When glory, peace, and hope were here,
And beautiful upon her mountains
The feet of angel-messengers."

Hitchcock, David, a shoemaker, b. 1773, at Bethlem, Litchfield county, Conn., pub. in 1806, at Boston, a vol. of Poetical Works, the chief poem of which—The Shade of Plato; or, A Defence of Religion, Morality, and Government—has been thought to possess considerable merit. See Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit.; Autobiography prefixed to Hitchcock's Poetical Works.

Hitchcock, Edward, D.D., LL.D., an eminent geologist, b. at Deerfield, Mass., May 24, 1793, became principal of an academy in his native town in 1816, and retained this situation for three years, when he was ordained, and subsequently was pastor of the Congregational church at Conway, Mass.; Professor of Chemistry and Natural History in Amherst College, 1825; appointed to make a Geological Survey of Massachusetts in 1836, and again in 1837; President of Amherst College, and Professor of Natural Theology and Geology, 1844; Agricultural Commissioner for Massachusetts, to visit the Agricultural Schools of Europe, 1850. In 1854 Dr. Hitchcock was induced by increasing bodily infirmities to resign the Presidency of Amherst College; but he still retains (1858) the Chair of Natural Theology and Geology. He was succeeded in the presidency by the Rev. Dr. William A. Stearns. Among Dr. Hitchcock's early literary labours were the preparation of an almanac for four years, (1815-18), and the composition of a Tragedy pub. in 1815, entitled The Downfall of Buonaparte. He has since then given to the world a number of works which have conferred upon him a distinguished reputation both in Europe and America. 1. Geology of the Connecticut Valley, 1823. 2. Catalogue of Plants within Twenty Miles of Amherst, 1829. 3. Dyspepsia Forestalled and Resisted, 1830. 4. An Argument for Early Temperance. Hoadly, Benjamin, D.D., 1676-1761, a native of Westerham, Kent, admitted of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, 1691, of which he became Fellow and Tutor; Lecturer of St. Mildred, London, 1701; Rector of St. Peter-le-Poor, London, 1704; Rector of Streatham, Surrey, 1710; Bishop of Bangor, 1715; Bishop of Hereford, 1721; Bishop of Salisbury, 1723; Bishop of Winchester, 1734. Bishop Hoadly pub. a number of sermons and controversial tracts, political and theological, which were collected and pub. by his son, John Hoadly, Chancellor of the Diocese of Winchester, 1773, 3 vols. fol. He first attracted attention by a Letter to Mr. Fleetwood, occasioned by his late Essay on Miracles, 1702, 4to, which we have already noticed: see FLEETWOOD, WILLIAM, D.D. This was followed by The Reasonableness of Conformity to the Church of England, 1703, 8vo, which he supported by some other tracts. He had here for his opponent the excellent Mr. Calamy, who represented the Dissenters of his way of thinking. See CALAMY, EDWARD. In 1707, 8vo, Hoadly pub. A Brief Defence of Episcopal Ordination:

"I like both the design and doctrine, as I do every design of reconciling religion with reason, or, where that may not be done, of bringing them as near together as possible."—Dr. MIDDLETON.

In 1735, 8vo, he gave to the world A Plain Account of the Nature and End of the Lord's Supper; a Defence of the same, 1735, '48, 8vo. This elicited a number of answers, a list of which will be found in Dr. Horne's Cal. of the Queen's Library at Cambridge, and in Watt's Bibl. Brit. Those who have not time or disposition to read all these treatises can remember Mr. Bickersteth's hint that Warren and Law's responses

"Sufficiently show the nature of and answer Bishop Hoadly's work."—Christian Student.

But the most memorable warfare in which Hoadly was engaged was that known as the Bangorian Controversy. This was elicited by a sermon, preached before the king in 1717, on St. John xviii. 36:—"My kingdom is not of this world."

"The manner in which he explained the text was, that the clergy had no pretensions to any temporal jurisdictions; but this was answered by Dr. Snape, (Letter to the Bishops of Bangor, 1717, 8vo); and, in the course of the debate, the argument sensibly changed from the rights of the clergy to that of princes, in the government of the church. Bishop Hoadly strenuously maintained that temporal princes had a right to govern in ecclesiastical politics. His most able opponent was the celebrated William Law, (The Bishop of Bangor's Late Sermon, and his Letter to Dr. Snape in defence of it, answered, 1717, 8vo,) who, in some material points, may be said to have gained a complete victory."

The inquisitive reader who desires to master this celebrated Controversy will find a guide in a vol. entitled An Account of all the considerable Pamphlets that have been published on the Present Controversy between the Bishop of Bangor and others to 1718, with a Continuation to 1719, 8vo, 1719-20. Some forty or fifty tracts were pub. upon this secræta quæstio. As an encouragement (!) to the reader who is impatient to spend a few winter evenings in the digestion of this knotty matter, we quote the experience of one of our most learned and acute of modern literary critics:

"A long and celebrated war of pens instantly commenced, known by the name of the Bangorian Controversy; managed, perhaps on both sides, with all the ebullience of polemical writers, and disgusting both from its tediousness, and from the manifest unwillingness of the disputants to speak ingenuously what they meant."

Then follows this note:

"These qualities are so apparent, that after turning over some forty or fifty tracts, and consuming a good many hours on the Bangorian Controversy, I should find some difficulty in stating with decision the propositions in dispute."—Hallam's Const. Hist. of England, ed. 1854; II. 243-244. Read the whole of these remarks, which throw considerable light upon the subject.

Bishop Hoadly's Sermons (1754-55, 2 vols. 8vo; Discourses, 4th ed., 1734, 8vo; and see his collected Works) are highly valued:

"Hoadly is very exact and judicious, and both his essence and style just, close, and clear."—Dr. WATERLAND.

As regards style, Pope complains of his long sentences:

"Swift for closer style,
But Hoadly for a period of a mile."

But the reader must also peruse Akenside's Complimentary Ode to Hoadly.

Hoadly, Benjamin, M.D., 1706-1757, eldest son of the preceding, and a native of London, educated at Bene't College, Cambridge, wrote the famous comedy of The Suspicious Husband, 1747, 8vo; assisted Hogarth in his Analysis of Beauty; wrote Three Lects. on The Organs of Respiration, 1737, pub. 1746, 4to; pub. a medical oration, 1742, 8vo; and gave to the world, in association with Mr. Wilson, Electrical Experiments, 1756, 4to. Hoadly, John, LL.D., 1711-1776, youngest son of Bishop Hoadly, was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, became Prob. of Westminster, and received other preferments. 1. Love's Revenge; a Pastoral, 1737, 4to. 2. Jephtha; an Oratorio, 1737, 8vo. 3. Phoebe; a Pastoral, 1748, 8vo. 4. The Force of Truth; an Oratorio, 1764.

He wrote a number of poems in Dodsley's Collection, pub. his father's works, (ante), and is supposed to have assisted his brother in The Suspicious Husband. He also revised Lillo's Arden of Feversham, wrote the 5th act of Miller's Mahomet, and left some dramatic works in MS. See Biog. Dramat.; Dodsley's Collection of Poems.

Hoare, Richard. A Journal of his Shrievalty in 1740-41, from his own MS., Bath, 1815, r. 4to. Privately printed by Sir Richard Colt Hoare, Bart.

Hoare, Sir Richard Colt, Bart., 1758-1838, an eminent antiquary, the eldest son of Sir Richard Hoare, the first baronet, was the author of several valuable publications, some of the most important of which we have already noticed. A list of his works, with a biography of the writer, will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag., July, 1838. We instance the following:—1. The Itinerary of Archbishop Baldwin through Wales; trans. into English, and illustrated with Views, Annotations, and a Life of Giraldus, Lon., 1806, 2 vols. 4to. See BARRY, GERALD, p. 134. See also Edin. Rev., viii. 399-413. 2. A Tour through the Isle of Elbe, 1814, r. 4to. 3. A Classical Tour through Italy, 1819, 2 vols. 4to; an ed. in 3 vols. 8vo. See EUSTACE, JOHN CHERWON, p. 563-564. 4. The History of Ancient Wiltshire, 1810-21, 5 Pts. imp. fol.; often bound in 2 vols., £21; large-paper copies, £31 10s. Sir Richard now commenced, assisted by able coadjutors, The Modern History of South Wiltshire, of which Pt. 1.—The Hundred of Mere—was pub. in 1822, and the last portion in 1843. Bound in 6 vols. fol., £42; large paper, £74. At the present date (1856) only about 20 perfect copies remain in the hands of the publishers,—Messrs. Nichols of London. These they offer at £30 for small paper; £60 for large-paper copies, bound either in 5 very large vols. or in 12 smaller ones. Sir Richard did not live to see this great work completed, nor was he able to include, as he had designed, the modern history of North Wiltshire. May we not yet hope for such a supplement as he would have rejoiced to see? His principal assistants in the Modern History of South Wiltshire were the Lord Arundell of Wardour, the Rev. John Offer; H. Wansey, Esq.; R. Harris, Esq.; C. Bowles, Esq.; W. H. Black, Esq.; George Matcham, Esq., LL.D., of Newhouse; R. Benson, Esq.; H. Hatcher, Esq.; and J. G. Nichols, Esq. We have already indicated our appreciation of enlightened topographical investigations of this character in our notice of George Baker's Hist. and Antiq. of Northamptonshire, p. 103. Hobart, Sir Henry, Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of Common Pleas temp. James I. Reports in the reign of K. James I., with some few Cases in the reign of Q. Elizabeth, Lon., 1641, 4to; 1650, '71, '78, '83, fol. New ed., with addits., by Edward Chilton, 1724, fol. 1st Amer. from the last English ed., by Judge J. M. Williams, Bos., 1829, 8vo. The Amer. ed. is on the whole preferable to the best English ed.—that of 1724; but Judge Williams has unfortunately left out several cases which he deemed of not much importance to the American lawyer. This omission is to be much regretted, and it involves the necessity of purchasing both eds. Professor Greenleaf contemplated editing Hobart's Reports, but relinquished the design and gave his notes to Judge Williams, who has inserted them in the early part of his ed. See Judge Story's Miscell. Writings, 1852, 274; Marvin's Leg. Bibl., 389-390, and authorities there cited. An interesting biographical notice of Judge Hobart will be found in Wallace's Reporters, 3d ed., 1855, 162-167.

Hobart, John Henry, D.D., 1775-1830, a native of Philadelphia, descended from Joshua Hobart, one of the early settlers of Massachusetts Bay, graduated at Princeton College, New Jersey, in 1793, and was appointed tutor in that institution in 1796; ordained by Bishop White in 1798, and stationed successively at Trinity Church, Oxford, All-Saints' Church, Pequestan, Christ Church, New Brunswick, a country parish at Hempstead, Long Island, and at Trinity Church, New York; elected Assistant Bishop of New York, 1811; sole Bishop, 1816. He was also Professor of Theology and Eloquence in the General Protestant Episcopal Seminary, New York, of which he was one of the principal founders. Bishop Hobart was a zealous advocate for the necessity of Episcopal ordination, and had (as we have seen) a controversy on this subject with the Rev. John M. Mason, D.D., of New York, and also (in 1811) with the Rev. J. C. Jones, an Episcopal clergyman. Dr. Mason's work, entitled Claims to Episcopacy Refuted, in a Review of the Essays of Bp. Hobart, &c., was pub., Lon., 1838, 12mo, with an Introduction and Appendix, by the Rev. John Blackburn, of Pentonville.

"His Pastoral Charges in defence of the leading doctrines, the polity and orders, of the Christian Church, are very argumentative and conclusive, and much admired. . . . The writings of Bp. Hobart have not been unappreciated in England. But his writings are only a small portion of the services he rendered to his generation; he was born to act rather than to write. His deeds are ably narrated by Dr. Berrian, a judicious friend and near connection of the deceased Bishop."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 656, 882.

Hobbes, Thomas, 1588-1679, a native of Malmesbury, Wiltshire, where his father was minister, was educated at the grammar-school of that place, and at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. In 1608 he became domestic tutor to Lord Cavendish, son of the Earl of Devonshire, with whom he travelled in France and Italy. On his return he became secretary to his ward, on his succeeding to his father's honour; but the death of the former, in 1628, dissolved a connexion which had been maintained for twenty years, and Hobbes was easily persuaded again to leave his country as a companion to the son of Sir Gervase Clifton. In 1631 he was solicited by the countess-dowager of Devonshire to return to England and assume the care of the young earl, then thirteen years of age, and he complied with this request. This arrangement led to a third visit to the Continent, where he resided with his new pupil from 1634 to 1637. Hobbes again returned to Paris, from political apprehensions, in 1641, and remained there until after the publication of his Leviathan. In 1647 he was appointed mathematical tutor to the Prince of Wales, (afterwards Charles II.) then resident in Paris. After the publication of his Leviathan, which appeared in 1651, he returned to England, and henceforth passed his summers at the Earl of Devonshire's seat in Derbyshire, and his winters in town. In 1674, having attained the great age of 86, he bade a last farewell to London, and retired to the residence of his patron, the Earl of Devonshire, in Derbyshire, to spend the rest of his days in seclusion. Here he remained in "ease and plenty," devoting the "morning to exercise and the afternoon to his studies," until his death in 1679, in the ninety-second year of his age, and about seventy-two years from the date of his first connexion with the illustrious family to three generations of which he had been the object of affectionate care and princely patronage. He was the intimate friend of Lord Herbert of Chisbury, Ben Jonson, and Lord Bacon, and is said to have assisted the latter in translating some of his works into Latin. An interesting account of his habits during his last years will be found in Bishop White Kennet's Memoirs of the Cavendish Family, and detailed notices of his publications and literary controversies in the authorities subjoined. Among the principal works of this celebrated philosopher are—1. Hist. of the Peloponnesian War, Lon., 1628, '34, '76, fol.; 1723, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The Translation of Thucydides, as he himself boasts, was published to show the evils of popular government."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: 2d Prim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

2. De Mirabilibus Poci; being the Wonders of the Peak in Devonshire. This is a long Latin poem. In Latin, 1636, '66, 8vo; 1675, 4to. In English and Latin, 1678, 8vo. 3. Elementa Philosophiæ, seu Politicæ de Cive, Paris, 1642, 4to: for private distribution. Pub., Amst., 1647, '50, '60, '69, 12mo. See No. 6. 4. Human Nature; or, the Fundamental Principles of Policy concerning the Faculties and Passions of the Human Soul, Lon., 1650, '51, 12mo. This has been called the ablest of his writings. See No. 6. 5. De Corpore Politico; or, the Elements of Law, Moral and Politick, 1650, 8vo. See No. 6. 6. Leviathan; or, the Matter, Forme, and Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civil, 1651, 8vo, fol. In Latin, 1668, 4to; Amst., 1670, 4to. This work may be called an amplification of Nos. 3, 4, and 5; and is "so constructed as to form a complete digest of all his opinions, religious, moral, and theological."

"In 1651 the complete system of his philosophy was given to the world in the Leviathan. These three works [Nos. 3, 5, and 6] bear somewhat the same relation to one another that the Advancement of Learning does to the treatise De Augustinis Scientiarum; they are in effect the same; the same order of subjects, the same arguments, and in most places either the same words, or such variations as occurred to the second thoughts of the writer; but much is more copiously illustrated and more clearly put in the latter than in the former, while much also, from whatever cause, is withdrawn or considerably modified."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, ii. 530.

As regards politics, the Leviathan advocates the unlimited power of princes; the Leviathan is the body politic, which must be kept in chains: in point of morals, his principles tend to "confound all distinctions between right and wrong, and indirectly to undermine the foundations of all religion, natural and revealed." Such doctrines were hailed with delight by the advocates of despotism, and libertines of all classes were glad to find an apology for their vices in the teachings of a philosopher who enjoyed the reputation of a sage. The rapid circulation of so dangerous a work elicited the watchful care of the guardians of public morals and the press. An amusing chronicle of the day furnishes us with an appropriate note upon this head:

"To my booksellers for Hobbes's Leviathan, which is now mightily called for, and what was heretofore sold for 8s., I now give 24s. at the second hand, and is sold for 30s. It being a book the Bishop will not let be printed again."—Sept. 3, 1668: Pepys's Diary.

The defenders were not backward in exposing the absurdity and mischievous tendency of such speculations:

"Cudworth was one of those whom Hobbes had roused by the atheistic and immoral theories of the Leviathan."—(Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, iii. 304.)

and we have already had occasion to notice his masterly vindication of correct principles, (see CUDWORTH, RALPH, p. 457.) Nor should we omit to notice Cumberland's De Legibus Naturæ, or Lord Clarendon's Survey of the Leviathan. But at the close of this article, where we shall have something more to say respecting the character of Hobbes's political and moral philosophy, we shall give a list of the principal opponents of his pernicious speculations.

7. Letter about Liberty and Necessity, Lon., 1654, 12mo. This elicited a controversy with Archbishop Bramhall (see BRAMHALL, JOHN, D.D., p. 238) and Bishop Laney. Hobbes pub. an account of his controversy with Bramhall, in 1656, 4to, and of that with Laney, in 1670, 12mo. 8. Elementorum Philosophiæ: Sectio prima, de Corpore, iv. partibus, 1655, 8vo; in English, 1656, 4to: Sectio secunda, 1657, 4to; Amst., 1668, 4to. This led to a twenty years' controversy between Hobbes and Dr. Wallis, Savilian Professor of Geometry at Oxford, in which Hobbes made himself the laughing-stock of the mathematicians of the day, but would never acknowledge his defeat. He declared that he had discovered the quadrature of the circle, and all evidence to the contrary was answered by the foulest personal abuse. In defence of his untenable position, he pub. a number of treatises which gratified his spleen if they did not convince his opponents. An account of this war will be found in Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors. 9. The Voyage of Ulysses; or, Homer's Odyssey, books ix., x., xi., xii., in English, Lon., 1674, 8vo. 10. The Iliads and Odysseys of Homer, in English, with a Pref., 1675, 77, 12mo. Of this translation, condemned by Pope and Beattie, three large edita. were called for in less than ten years.

"His poetry, as well as Ogilby's, is too mean for criticism."—Pope.

Pope declares that Hobbes continually lops off circumstances, and now and then omits whole similes and sentences.

"Though called a translation of Homer, it does not even deserve the name of poem."—Beattie's Essay on Poetry and Music.

Hobbes thus apologised for his translation:

"Why then did I write it?—Because I had nothing else to do. Why publish it?—Because I thought it might take off my adversaries from shewing their folly upon my more serious writings."—Hobbes to the Reader.

11. Decameron Physiologicum; or, Ten Dialogues of Natural Philosophy, &c., 1678, 8vo. 12. Vita Thomæ Hobbes; a Latin Poem, 1679, 4to; in English verse, also by himself, 1680, fol.; in prose, 1681, 8vo; 1682, 4to; Carolop., 1681, 8vo; 1682, 8vo. This Life was written in his 85th year. 13. Behemoth: the Hist. of the Civil Wars of England from 1640 to 1660, Lon., 1679, 8vo.

"This history is in dialogue, and full of paradoxes, like all his other writings. More philosophical, political,—or any thing, rather than historical; yet full of shrewd observations."—Bisshop Warburton.

14. Historia Ecclesiastica Carmine Elegiaco concinnata, Aug. Trinob., [i.e. London,] 1688, 8vo; in English, entitled, A True Eccles. Hist. from Moses to Luther; in verse, &c., Lon., 1722, 8vo.

"Auctor maxime contra Pontiff. Rom. ejusque potestatem disputat, Patres Nicænos acerbe perstringit, monstratque se ab indifferentismo religionum hab. alienum est."—WALCH.

Hobbes had pub. in Amsterdam, in 1668, 2 vols. 4to, Opera Philosophica quæ Latine scripsit omnia. This is a beautiful edit. There appeared in 1715, Lon., fol., his Moral and Political Works, with Life, &c., with a Supp., by Dr. Blackbourne, &c. But a complete collection of his Works, now first collected and edited by Sir William Molesworth, Bart., M.P., was pub. in 1839–45, 16 vols. 8vo, £8; or The English Works, in 11 vols., £5 10s.; Latin Works, in 5 vols., £2 8s. The principal writers against Hobbes are Lordes Clarendon, Shaftesbury, and Kames; Archbishops Bramhall and Tenison; Bishops Cumberland, Butler, Laney, and Lucy; Drs. Gudworth, Eachard, Parker, Henry Moore, Hutcheson, and Samuel Clarke; Sir James Mackintosh, James Harrington, Dugald Stewart, Smith, and Brown. It is almost needless to state that such an array of talent was hardly necessary for the confutation of the sophisms and absurdities which mingle so strangely with the evidences of uncommon acumen and philosophical shrewdness which so eminently distinguished the intellectual speculations of this great writer. His inconsistency was not confined to his writings; for he was in the habit of the frequent reception of the eucharist, whilst promulgating opinions subversive of Christianity: which reminds us of his declaration that "Holy Scripture is the voice of God, ruling all things by the greatest right," whilst he yet taught men to cast the Scriptures to the winds at the command of their earthly ruler.

"Thought is free," he tells us; "but when it comes to confession of faith, the private reason must submit to the public,—that is to say, to God's Lieutenant."—De Ore; Leviathan.

The mischievous effects of his doctrines in his own generation are graphically described by Mr. Macaulay in his History of England, now passing through the press, (see vol. i. chap. 2.); and the philosophers of our own day have confirmed the censure which rebuked the first publication of his errors:

"Before dismissing the system of Hobbes, it may be worth while to remark that all his leading principles are traced by Gudworth to the remains of the ancient sceptics, by some of whom, as well as by Hobbes, they seem to have been adopted from a wish to flatter the uncontrolled passions of sovereigns."—DUGALD STEWART: 1st Princis. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

"Hobbes having thus struck the affections out of his map of human nature, and having totally misunderstood (as will appear in a succeeding part of this Dissertation) the nature even of the appetites, it is no wonder that we should find in it not a trace of the moral sentiments. Moral good he considers merely as consisting in the signs of a power to produce pleasure; and repentance is no more than regret at having missed the way; so that, according to this system, a disinterested approbation of and reverence for virtue are no more possible than disinterested affections towards our fellow-creatures."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: 2d Princis. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

"The political system of Hobbes, like his moral system, of which, in fact, it is only a portion, sears up the heart. It takes away the sense of wrong, that has consoled the wise and good in their dangers, the proud appeal of Innocence under oppression, like that of Prometheus to the elements, uttered to the witnessing world, in coming ages, to the just ear of Heaven. It confounds the principles of moral approbation, the notions of good and ill desert, in a servile idolatry of the monstrous Leviathan it creates, and, after sacrificing all right at the altar of power, denies to the Omnipotent the prerogative of dictating the laws of his own worship."—HALLAM'S Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, II. 542.

A man of such remarkable mental ability and uncommon intellectual force could not but command a respectful hearing, even from those who the most deeply regretted the mischievous character of his speculations. His most illustrious opponent approaches the lists not without undisguised hesitation:

"Mr. Hobbes is one of the oldest friends I have in the world, and for whom I have always had a great esteem, as a man who, besides his eminent learning and knowledge, has been always thought a man of probity and free from scandal; but when I reflected upon the mischievous principles scattered through his Leviathan, I felt myself obliged to make these animadversions upon it."—Clarendon's Survey, p. 3.

An eminent prelate, and a most unscrupulous "man of war from his youth," displays no indisposition to allow the philosopher all that he could justly claim:

"Here let us do justice to that great man's memory, at a time when his writings seem to be entirely neglected, who, with all his errors, we must allow to be one of the first men of his age for a bright wit, a deep penetration, and a cultivated understanding."—Bisshop Warburton.

Mr. Mill, who was one of the first to call the attention of modern readers to the writings of this philosopher, remarks:

"Hobbes is a great name in philosophy, on account both of the value of what he taught, and the extraordinary impulse which he communicated to the spirit of Free Inquiry in Europe."

To the same effect, Mr. Hallam observes:

"In nothing does Hobbes deserve more credit than in having set an example of close observation in the philosophy of the human mind."—Lit. Hist. of Europe.

Mr. Macaulay, also, referring to the young men of distinguished talents who were sometimes the companions of Bacon's retirement, remarks that

"Among them his quick eye soon discerned the superior abilities of Thomas Hobbes. It is not probable, however, that he fully appreciated the powers of his disciple, or foresaw the vast influence both for good and evil which that most vigorous and acute of human intellects was destined to exercise on the two succeeding generations."—Edin. Rev., July, 1857; and in the Essays, II. 193.

Again, in the History of England, the same learned critic tells us that

"Thomas Hobbes had, in language more precise and luminous than has ever been employed by any other metaphysical writer, maintained that the will of the prince was the standard of right and wrong."—Vol. I. chap. 11.

"Thomas Hobbes, a man of much learning, more thinking, and not a little knowledge of the world, was one of the most celebrated and admired authors of his age. His style is incomparably better than that of any other writer in the reign of Charles I., and was, for its uncommon strength and purity, scarce equalled in the succeeding reign."—GRAMER: Biog. Hist. of Eng.

The popularity of this writer was undoubtedly greatly owing to this remarkable purity of style:

"A permanent foundation of his fame remains in his admirable style, which seems to be the very perfection of didactic language. Short, clear, precise, pithy, his language never has more than one meaning, which it never requires a second thought to take. By the help of his exact method it takes so firm a hold on the mind, that it will not allow attention to slacken."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: ubi supra.

"His language is so lucid and concise, that it would be almost as improper to put an algebraical process in different terms as some of his metaphysical paragraphs."—HALLAM: ubi supra.

As a political economist, also, the claims of our author are not to be forgotten:

"Hobbes seems to have been one of the first who had any thing like a distinct perception of the real source of wealth."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., v. 9.

With such powers for extensive usefulness to his race, how melancholy is it to be obliged to record of this great philosopher, in the language of Hume, (certainly not a suspicious witness,) that

"Hobbes's politics are fitted only to promote tyranny, and his ethics to encourage licentiousness."—Hist. of England, Bowyer's ed., IV. 660.

Hoby, Sir Edward, entered of Trin. Coll., Oxford, 1674, a man of great learning, was the son of Sir Thomas Hoby. He pub. Purgatorie's Triumph over Hell, 1609, 4to, and several other theolog. treatises; for an account of which, and their author, see Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon., ii. 194-197. He was a friend of Camden, who dedicated his Hibernia to him.

Hoby, Sir Thomas, father of the preceding, and ambassador for Queen Elizabeth to France, trans. Castiglione's Cortegiano into English, under the title of The Courtyer of Coynt Baldessar Castilio, Lon., 1561, '88, 4to; and also trans. the Gratulation, &c. of Bucer into English, sine anno, 8vo. See Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon., i. 352-353. Respecting the first-named work, Sir John Cheke wrote Hoby an interesting epistle, in which he gently censures his use of foreign words.

Hoccham, William of. See OCCAM.

Hoccleve, or Oocleve, Thomas, an early English poet, a lawyer, and writer to the privy-seal, is supposed to have been born about 1376, and to have died in 1454. Some of his poems were pub. (never before printed) in 1796, 4to, by Mr. George Mason, from a MS. in his possession. The Story of Jonathan has been thought his best poem.

"After the death of Chaucer, in 1400, a dreary blank of long duration occurs in our annals. The poetry of Hoccleve is wretchedly bad, abounding with pedantry, and destitute of all grace or spirit."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

"As the reputation of Dr. Hodge as a Biblical scholar and theologian has already been fully established, we need only announce a new work from his pen to insure its ready reception. His Commentary on the Ephesians displays the ripe scholarship, the convincing analysis, and the practical development, which imparted such value to his exposition of the Epistle to the Romans. It is a book for the study of the scholar, and yet most happily adapted for the instruction of general readers, by whom it should be promptly purchased. While we do not regard any man as infallible, we know of no one who is a safer guide to the study of the Scriptures than Professor Hodge."—Presbyterian.

Oxford, 1698; Archdeacon of Oxford, 1704. His most noted works are the following:—1. Dissertation against Aristæus's Hist. of the Seventy-two Interpreters, 1680; Oxon., 1684, 8vo.

"Written in opposition to Isaac Vossius, and completely succeeds in destroying the credit of the lying fable of the Jew respecting the Septuagint."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Vossius attacked this work in an Appendix to his Pomponius Mela, and Hody responded when he pub. a new ed. of his Dissertation in his De Bibliorum Textibus Originalibus. See No. 5. 2. The Resurrection of the same Body asserted, 1694, 8vo. 5. De Bibliorum Textibus Originalibus, versionibus Græcis, et Latina Vulgata, Libri Quatuor, Oxon., 1705, fol.

"This is the classical work on the Septuagint. . . . Among the writers on the Septuagint version, no one has displayed either more knowledge of the subject or more critical sagacity than Hody."—Bisnor MSS.

"It exemplifies with great accuracy, and discusses with much learning and ability, every question relating to the age, the authors, the character and progress of that celebrated version. All subsequent writers have been greatly indebted to this work of Hody."—Orme's Bibl. Bib. See Horne's Bibl. Bib.

6. De Græcis Illustribus Linguis Græcæ Instauratoribus, &c., Lon., 1742, 8vo. Posth. Pub. from Hody's MSS. by Dr. S. Jebb. This erudite work contains an account of those learned Grecians who retired to Italy about the time of the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, and restored the Greek tongue and learning in those western parts.

"Hody was perhaps the first who threw much light on the early studies of Greek in Italy; and his book, De Græcis Illustribus linguis Græcæ Instauratoribus, will be read with pleasure and advantage by every lover of literature; though Mehus, who came with more exuberant erudition to the subject, has pointed out a few errors. But more is to be found as to its native cultivators, Hody being chiefly concerned with the Greek refugees, in Bayle's Fabricius, Nicéron, Mehus, Zeno, Tiraboschi, Melinæ, Roscoe, Heeren, Shepherd, Corniani, Ginguené, and the Biographie Universelle, whom I name in chronological order."—*Hallam's Lit. Hoffman, Charles Fenno, b. in the city of New York in 1806, a son of Judge Josiah Ogden Hoffman, and a brother of the eminent lawyer, Ogden Hoffman, entered Columbia College at the age of fifteen, and was admitted to the New York Bar when twenty-one. After three years of legal practice, Mr. Hoffman determined to indulge to its full extent the strong inclination which he had always entertained for literary pursuits; and he accordingly abandoned Coke and Blackstones for the more congenial fields of Romance and Poetry. He has since given to the world—1. A Winter in the West, New York, 1835, 2 vols. 12mo; Lon., 1835, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"It has since passed through several editions, and will continue to be admired so long as graphic delineations of nature, spirited sketches of men and manners, and richness and purity of style, are appreciated."—R. W. Gaiswold: Press Writers of America.

2. Wild Scenes in Forest and Prairie, Lon., (1837?) 1839, 2 vols. p. 8vo. With addita, N. York, 1843, 2 vols. 12mo. 3. Greyslaer; a Romance of the Mohawk, 1849, '49, 12mo. This is founded on the celebrated criminal trial of Beauchamp for the murder of Colonel Sharpe, of Kentucky.

"It happily blends historical facts connected with the border-annals of our State with the fictitious story of love, and displays the powers of a master-painter of human passion. We regard the author of this book as one of the best writers in the country."—Southern Literary Messenger.

Greyslaer met with remarkable success; two edits. were printed in New York, one in Phila., and a fourth in London, in the same year. Mr. William Gilmore Sims has since pub. a novel—Beauchamp—founded on the same tragical incidents.

4. The Vigil of Faith, a Legend of the Adirondack Mountains; and other Poems, N. York, 1842, 12mo. Several edits. have been pub. in America and England. 5. The Echo; or, Borrowed Notes for Home Circulation, Phila., 1844. The title of this work was suggested by some remarks in an article, on Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America, in the Foreign Quarterly Review, in which the reviewer charges Hoffman with borrowing largely from Moore. 6. Lays of the Hudson, and other Poems, N. York, 32mo. 7. Love's Calendar, and other Poems, 1848. This vol. contains a more complete collection of his lyrical compositions than will be found in the Echo. Mr. Hoffman prepared for publication another novel, entitled The Red Spur of Ramapo; but the MS. was destroyed by the carelessness of a servant. In 1833 Mr. H. established that well-known and excellent Journal, The Knickerbocker Magazine, and edited a few numbers, after which he transferred it to the Rev. Timothy Flint. Mr. Hoffman subsequently became proprietor and editor of the American Monthly Magazine, (started by Henry William Herbert, Esq.,) and was its chief editor for many years, during one of which he also discharged the editorial duties connected with the New York Mirror. In the former he pub., in 1837, a novel entitled Vanderlyn. For about eighteen months (in 1846-47) he was the editor of the New York Literary World: see DUCKINCK, EVERET A., p. 555. He has also been a contributor to the New Yorker, the Corsair, and other periodicals. His contributions to the New York American (distinguished by a *) whilst its associate-editor with Charles King, about 1828-30, added greatly to the reputation of that journal. Nor must we omit to render our acknowledgments to this versatile author for his historical sketch pub. in Sparks's American Biography, 2d Series, iii. 179-238, entitled The Administration of Jacob Leisler; a Chapter in American History. It is as a lyrical poet that Mr. Hoffman is best known to the world, and in this department he unquestionably occupies a very high rank. Among the principal favourites of the songs which have carried his name so extensively through the social circles of the land are Rosalie Clare, 'Tis Hard to Share her Smiles with Many, Sparkling and Bright, and The Myrtle and Steel.

An eminent American critic, referring to this department of poetical authorship,—the song,—remarks:

"Whatever may be thought of it as an order of writing, I am satisfied that Mr. Hoffman has come as near to the highest standard or idea of excellence which belongs to this species of composition, as any American poet has done in his own department, whatever that department may be."—R. W. GANSWOLD: Poets and Poetry of America, 16th ed., 1864.

See the same author's opinion of Hoffman's prose compositions in his Prose Writers of America, 4th ed., 1852, p. 31.

"For some of the best convivial, amatory, and descriptive poetry of native origin, we are indebted to Charles Fenno Hoffman. The woods and streams, the feast and the vigil, are reflected in his verse with a graphic truth and sentiment that evidence an eye for the picturesque, a sense of the adventurous, and a zest for pleasure. He has written many admirable scenic pieces that evince not only a careful but a loving observation of nature: some touches of this kind in the Vigil of Faith are worthy of the most celebrated poets. Many of his songs, from their graceful flow and tender feeling, are highly popular, although some of the metres are too like those of Moore not to provoke a comparison. They are, however, less tainted with artifice; and many of them have a spontaneous and natural vitality."—H. T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit.

Hoffman, David, LL.D., J.U.D., 1784-1854, a native of Baltimore, Maryland, an eminent lawyer and legal writer, from 1817 to 1836 Professor of Law in the University of Maryland, after the termination of his connexion with this institution resided two years in Europe, and subsequently settled in Philadelphia, where he remained until 1847. In the fall of this year he again visited Europe, returning home in 1853. He died suddenly, of an attack of apoplexy, in New York, November 11, 1854.

1. A Course of Legal Study; respectfully addressed to the Students of Law in the United States, Balt., 1817, pp. 283; 2d ed., rewritten and much enlarged, 1836, 2 vols. 8vo., pp. xvii., 876. The first ed. was most favourably reviewed by Judge Story, in the North American Review for July, 1817. We give a brief extract from this admirable article, which every lawyer should peruse with close attention.

"Mr. Hoffman has published a Course of Legal Study, which he modestly addresses to students, but which is well worthy the attention of every gentleman of the bar. In quitting the work we have not the slightest hesitation to declare that it contains by far the most perfect system for the study of the law which has ever been offered to the public."—N. Amer. Rev., vi. 45-77.

The 2d ed. was reviewed by George S. Hillard, in the North American Review for January, 1838, (xvi. 72-82,) who commends the work in the highest terms; and it has been rewarded by the approbation of Marshall, Kent, De Witt Clinton, and other competent judges in Europe and America. Unfortunately, this is the only vol. of this excellent work which ever saw the light. It was favourably reviewed by Mr. P. Cruise, in the North American Review for January, 1836, xxx. 135-160, q. v.; and see also Story's Inaug. Discourse, 45, n.; 3 Amer. Jur., 86; 1 Ang. L. J., 264; 36 *N. Amer. This may be considered as a sequel to No. 3. 5. Legal Hints; being a condensation of the leading ideas as relating to Professional Department, contained in a Course of Legal Study, with the addition of some Counsel to Law-Students, Phila., 1840. 6. Chronicles, selected from the Originals of Cartaphilus, the Wandering Jew: embracing a period of nearly nineteen Centuries. Now first revealed to and edited by David Hoffman, Lon., 1855, 2 vols. 8vo. These two vols. are all that was given to the world of a work which was to have been extended to 6 vols. Vol. iii. (concluding Series 1, and reaching to A.D. 573) was ready for the press at the time of the death of the author. Series 2 (vols. iv. v. vi.) were in a state of partial preparation. The design was no less than a History of the World from the Christian era to the present time. To the compilation of this vast work Mr. Hoffman had devoted much time, arduous labour, and a large pecuniary outlay. This adds another to the many instances we have recorded in the course of this volume of cherished designs frustrated, anxious hopes disappointed, and "purposes broken off in the midst." But if the solemn consciousness of the approach of the "inexorable hour" warned him who had toiled so faithfully for his generation, that he must cease from his labours ere he should enter upon that goodly heritage of honourable fame and extensive usefulness which had long been the goal of his ambition in the preparation of the great work of his life, he could yet look back with satisfaction at the good already accomplished by those invaluable fruits of his wisdom which he was permitted to give to the world. To adopt the language of another,

"If we were called upon to designate any single work which had exercised a greater influence over the profession of the law in this country than all others, which had most stimulated the student in his studies, most facilitated his labour, and, in fine, most contributed to elevate the standard of professional learning and morals, we should unhesitatingly select Hoffman's Course of Legal Study."—N. Amer. Rev., xlv. 482.

"The constant reply of Lagrange to the young men who consulted him respecting their mathematical studies was, 'Study Euler'; and in like manner we should say to every law-student, from Maine to Louisiana, 'Study Hoffman.'"—GEOFFREY S. HILLARD: N. Amer. Rev., xlv. 82.

In the words of another admirer of this excellent and useful writer:

"What Cujacius said of Paul de Castro has been appropriately applied to Professor Hoffman's Course of Legal Study: Qui non habet Finium de Castro, finem vendit, et emat."

Hoffand, Mrs. Barbara. See HOFLAND, MRS. THOMAS CHRISTOPHER.

Hoffand, Thomas Christopher, 1777-1843, a distinguished landscape-painter, and an enthusiastic disciple of Isaac Walton, was a native of Worsop, Nottinghamshire. 3. Specimens of Garden Decorations and Scenery, 1846.

Hoffand, Mrs. Thomas Christopher, 1770-1844, wife of the preceding, formerly Miss Barbara Wreaks, a daughter of Robert Wreaks, of Sheffield, was married in 1796 to Mr. T. Bradshaw Hoole, who died in 1798. In 1805 she pub. a vol. of poems upon a subscription-list of nearly 2000 copies, the profit on which enabled her to open a small school at Harrowgate, where the duties of tuition were relieved by the pleasures of authorship. In 1808 she was married to Thomas Christopher Hoffman, the eminent landscape-painter, but did not permit her new engagements to relax her literary application, for in 1812 we find that she gave to the world no less than five different works. This literary activity distinguished Mrs. Hoffman for the remainder of her life. In 1833 she was deprived by death of her son by her first husband, the Rev. Mr. Hoole, curate of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and in 1843 she was again left a widow. She wrote in all about seventy works, (of which nearly 300,000 copies were sold in Great Britain, and many thousands on the continent and in America,) and pub. a large number of pieces in magazines and annuals. Among the best-known of her works—which consist almost entirely of novels and moral tales—are: 1. The Daughter-in-Law. 2. Emily. 3. The Son of a Genius. 4. Beatrice. 5. Says she to her Neighbour, What? 6. Captives in India. 7. The Unloved One. 8. The Czarina. 9. Ellen, the Teacher. 10. The Merchant's Widow. 11. Adelaide. 12. Humility. 13. Fortitude. 14. Decision. 15. Integrity. 16. The Clergyman's Widow. 17. Daniel Dennison. 18. Self-Denial. 19. Letter of an Englishwoman. 20. Tales of the Priory. 21. Tales of the Manor. A Biographical notice of Mrs. Hoffman will be found in the Lon. Gent. Mag., January, 1845; but for a detailed memoir of her life, accompanied by her Literary Remains, we must refer the reader to Mr. Thomas Ramsay's vol. with this title, Lon., 1849, 12mo. The author of the biography in Gent. Mag., referring to the many editions and large sale of her works, remarks:

"When this immense circulation is considered, in connexion with the fact that all her works were successfully devoted to improve the heart by pleasing and powerful lessons, we may form some idea of the debt of gratitude and esteem that is her due."

Hogarth, George, a native of Scotland, late writer to the signet in Edinburgh, was for many years musical and dramatic critic of the London Morning Chronicle; but since the establishment of the Daily News, in 1846, by his son-in-law, Charles Dickens, the author, he has been connected with that sheet in a similar capacity. 1. Musical History, Biography, and Criticism, Lon., 1836, 2 vols. 12mo. Hogarth, Richard, a schoolmaster in London, father of William Hogarth, the celebrated artist. Dissertationes Grammaticales, Lon., 1712, 8vo.

Hogarth, William, 1697-1764, a celebrated painter and engraver, son of the preceding, was a native of London. In 1730 he ran away with the daughter of the eminent artist, Sir James Thornhill, who was soon reconciled to the match by the remarkable talents of his volunteer son-in-law. We have already had occasion to refer to his Analysis of Beauty, Lon., 1754, '72, '83, 4to, (in Italian, Leghorn, 1761,) in which he was assisted by Dr. Benjamin Hoadly, Dr. Morell, and the Rev. Mr. Townley. This is a work of decided merit. In his capacity as an artist he does not enter within the design of our Dictionary. For an account of his works, collections of his plates, &c., consult authorities cited below. Especially see—1. The Genuine Works of Wm. Hogarth, illustrated with Biographical Anecdotes, a Chronological Catalogue and Commentary, by John Nichols and George Stevens, 1808-17, 3 vols. 4to; £14 4s. Large paper, £27 6s.

Hogg, J. J. Lect. on Study of Civil Law, Lon., 1831, 8vo.

Hogg, James, "The Ettrick Shepherd," December 9, 1770-Nov. 21, 1835, first saw the light in a cottage on the banks of the Ettrick River, in Selkirkshire, Scotland. His ancestors had been shepherds for five centuries, and James commenced his apprenticeship in the same humble calling when only seven years of age. Few authors who have obtained reputation have commenced on so slender a stock of knowledge; for the whole of the shepherd's scholastic education was comprised in six months' instruction received before he was eight years of age. In 1790 he entered the service of Mr. Laidlaw as a shepherd, and remained in this post for the ensuing ten years, the leisure hours of which were profitably occupied with the perusal of books from his master's library. In 1796 he commenced the composition of songs and ballads, and in the next year an ardent desire to be the successor of Burns—of whom he then first heard—gave an impetus to his poetical genius, which, to the astonishment of the world, resulted some years later in the production of The Queen's Wake. Some of his juvenile pieces happened at this time to fall into the hands of Sir Walter Scott, by whom they were highly commended. The first of his published productions, The Patriot Lay of Donald McDonald, composed in 1800, and printed in 1801, soon became a general favourite, and was sung amidst acclamations, published and set to music, whilst even the name of the author was unknown. In 1801 he wrote a prose essay called Reflections on a View of the Nocturnal Heavens, and in the same year, whilst on a visit to Edinburgh to dispose of some of his sheep, he published a collection of his best poems. In 1802 he contributed to Sir Walter Scott's Border Minstrelsy; and five years later gave to the world The Shepherd's Guide, (an Essay on Sheep,) and a vol. of songs, ballads, and tales, entitled The Mountain Bard. By these two works he made about £300, which was soon swallowed up in the cultivation of an unprofitable farm; and the publication of the Forest Minstrel, a collection of the poet's early songs, in 1810, failed to meet with that encouragement which the declining fortunes of the author greatly needed. In the same year he commenced the issue of a periodical, intended as a censor of literature and manners, entitled The Spy. For this self-imposed task the conductor was altogether unsuited, and the new paper lingered but a twelvemonth and then expired. One good result, however, is to be attributed to the publication of The Spy. Some of his friends were so much pleased with some of the poetry contributed by the editor to his sheet, that they urged him to attempt the composition of a regular poem. Hogg was always ready to be encouraged; and his friends were gratified, with the rest of the world, in the spring of 1813, by the publication of The Queen's Wake, a Legendary Poem, by far his best production, and one which would not have disgraced the best of the great poets who were at that time delighting the literary circles of the day. Of the seventeen ballads in this work, the general favourite is the legend of Kilmeny:—certainly an exquisite production. The reputation of the author was now established: the poet became a celebrity; and happy was that lady of quality who could secure for her fashionable parties the rustic form, and still more rustic songs and witticisms, of the far-famed Ettrick Shepherd. The Queen's Wake soon reached its 5th edit., and the Shepherd needed nothing more to make him an author for life, as the following list of works, which appeared in rapid succession, will abundantly testify. POETRY: 1. Pilgrims of the Sun, 1815, 1 vol. 2. The Hunting of Badlewe, 1 vol. 3. Madoo of the Moor, 1816, 1 vol. 4. Poetic Mirror; or, Living Bards of Britain, 1 vol. This work, consisting of imitations of distinguished living poets, was all (with the exception of Scott's pretended epistle to Southey,—the work of Thomas Pringle) written by Hogg in three weeks. 5. Dramatic Tales, 2 vols. 6. Sacred Melodies, 1 vol. 7. The Border Garland, 1 vol. 8. The Jacobite Relics of Scotland: vol. I., 1819; vol. II., 1821. Partly original. 9. Queen Hynde, 1825, 1 vol. 10. The Royal Jubilee; a Masque, 1 vol. 11. A Selection of his Songs, 1831, 1 vol. 12. The Queer Book: 26 Miscellaneous Poems, some of which had appeared in Blackwood, 1 vol. A collection of his best poems was pub. at Edinburgh in 1822, in 4 vols. 8vo. PROSE: 13. The Brownie of Bodsbeck, and other Tales, 1818, 2 vols. 14. Winter Evening Tales, 1820, 2 vols. 15. The Three Perils of Man, 1822, 3 vols. 16. The Three Perils of Woman, 1823, 3 vols. 17. The Confessions of a Justified Sinner, 1824, 1 vol. 18. The Shepherd's Calendar, 1829, 2 vols. Composed of tales originally pub. in Blackwood's Magazine. 19. Altrive Tales, 1832. Vol. I. only appeared, although twelve were contemplated, one every other month. The Tales were to be such traditional stories as were current with the Altrive peasantry, and collected from them. The failure of Cochran & Co., the publishers, prevented the prosecution of the plan. 20. Do- metist Manners of Sir Walter Scott, 1834. Considered a very impertinent production. 21. Lay Sermons, 1834, 1 vol. 22. Tales of the Wars of Montrose, 1835, 3 vols. In 1817 Hogg found himself settled on his farm of Altrive, consisting of seventy acres on the banks of the Yarrow, for which he was indebted to the kindness of the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch. In 1820, in his 48th year, he was married to Miss Margaret Phillips, who seems to have made him a very good wife: she and three of their children, daughters, are now living, and Mrs. Hogg was recently pensioned by government. Shortly after his marriage he took up his residence at Mount Bengier; but, being again unfortunate in his agricultural experiments, he was obliged to return to Altrive. The last years of his life were tranquilly passed in the prosecution of his literary pursuits, varied by the sports of the field, to which he was passionately attached. In the autumn of 1835 his health was prostrated by an attack of the jaundice, which resulted in a disease of the liver, and terminated fatally on the 21st of November, 1835, in the 56th year of his age. For further information respecting this uneducated genius, we refer the reader to his autobiographical reminiscences; to the Memoir, by Professor John Wilson, prefixed to Blackie & Co.'s collective edit. of Hogg's Works, 1850, 5 vols. 12mo; Life, by Dr. R. We have already stated that the Queen's Wake is considered to be by far the best of his productions: a few brief notices of this poem may therefore be here appropriately introduced:

"The Queen's Wake is a garland of fair forest-flowers, bound with a band of rushes from the moor. It is not a poem,—not it; nor was it intended to be so; you might as well call a bright bouquet of flowers a flower, which, by-the-by, we do in Scotland. Some of the ballads are very beautiful; one or two even splendid; most of them spirited; and the worst far better than the best that was ever written by any bard in danger of being a blockhead. Kilmeny alone places our (ay, our) Shepherd among the Undying Ones."—PROFESSOR WILSON: Christopher North's Recreations: An Hour's Talk about Poetry.

"The poem is unequal, and it could not well be otherwise; it consists of the songs of many minstrels in honour of Queen Mary, united together by a sort of recitative, very rambling, amusing, and characteristic. Some of the strains of the contending Bards are of the highest order, both of conception and execution; the Abbot of Eye has great ease, vigour, and harmony, and the story of the Fair Kilmeny, for true simplicity, exquisite loveliness, and graceful and original fancy, cannot be matched in the whole compass of British song."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"The specimens we have already given [of Kilmeny] will enable the reader to judge of the style and manner of this singular composition; upon the strength of which alone we should feel ourselves completely justified in assuring the author that no doubt can be entertained that he is a poet, in the highest acceptation of the name."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., Nov. 1814.

"The Legend of Kilmeny is as beautiful as any thing in that department of poetry. It contains a fine moral:—that purity of heart makes an earthly creature a welcome denizen of heaven; and the tone and imagery are all fraught with a tenderness and grace that are as unearthly as the subject of the legend."—HOWITT'S Homes and Haunts of the Brit. Poets.

"Kilmeny has been the theme of universal admiration, and deservedly so, for it is what Warton would have denominated 'pure poetry.' It is, for the most part, the glorious emanation of a sublime fancy,—the spontaneous sprouting forth of amarantine flowers of sentiment,—the bubbling out and swelling over of inspiration's fountain."—D. M. MORRIS: Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

An acute critic, already quoted, after noticing Hogg's defects as a prose-writer, evinces a disposition to do full justice to his real merits:

"When he chooses to be simple and unaffected, there are few to match him: his Wool-Gatherer, some of his Winter Night's Tales,—which, instead of lengthening the nights, as a early critic averred, shortened them for thousands,—his Brownie of Bodebeck, and indeed all his fictions, exhibit much of the innocence and truth and blamelessness of pastoral life. In his finer moods, no one has equalled him in the rare power of uniting the elegance of superstitious fancy with the realities of life."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: vol. supra.

The name of the author of The Queen's Wake will recall to many the beautiful extemporaneous tribute of Wordsworth on hearing of the death of his brother poet:

"When first, descending from the moorlands,
I saw the stream of Yarrow glide
Along a bare and open valley,
The Ettrick Shepherd was my guide," &c.

Holcroft, Thomas, 1744–1809, a native of London, the son of a shoemaker, after being a groom and an actor, commenced writing for the stage, and became the author of a number of plays, poems, novels, and translations from the French and German. He was a member of the Society for Constitutional Reform; and learning, in 1794, that he was indicted, he voluntarily resigned himself to the proper authorities; but, upon the acquittal of Hardy, Holcroft and the other prisoners mentioned in the indictment were discharged without a trial. His best-known plays (over thirty of which are registered in the Biog. Dramat.) are—1. Duplicity; a Com., Lon., 1781, 8vo. Very successful. 2. The School for Arrogance; a Com., 1791, 8vo. 3. The Road to Ruin; a Com., 1792, 8vo.

"This comedy ranks among the most successful of modern plays. There is merit in the writing, but much more in that dramatic science which disposes characters, scenes, and dialogue, with minute attention to theatrical ambition."—MRS. INCHBALD.

"Mr. Holcroft, in his Road to Ruin, set the example of that style of comedy in which the slang phrases of jockey noblemen and the humours of the four-in-hand club are blended with the romantic sentiments of distressed damsels and philosophic waiting-maids, and in which he has been imitated by the most successful of our living writers, unless we make a separate class for the school of Cumberland."—HADFIELD'S Lects. on the Comic Writers of the Last Century.

4. The Deserted Daughter; a Com., 1795, 8vo. Very successful. Of his novels, among the most popular were—5. Alwyn; or, the Gentleman Comedian, 1780. 6. Anna St. Ives, 1792, 7 vols. 12mo. Tolerably successful. 7. Hugh Trevor, 1794, 3 vols. 12mo. 8. Bryan Perdue, 1805, 3 vols. sm. 8vo. In 1783, 4to, he pub. (9.) Human Happiness, or the Sceptic; a Poem;—a work of bad tendency; and in 1806, 2 vols. 12mo, gave to the world (10.) Tales in Verse, Critical, Satirical, and Humorous. See Miss Mitford's Recollec. of a Lit. Life; Edin. Rev., x. 101–111. Of his translations we may instance—11. Caroline of Lichfield; from the French, 1786, 3 vols. 8vo. 12. Life of Frederic, Baron Trenck; from the German, 1788, 3 vols. 12mo.

"If ever one happens to take up an English version of a French or German book of that period,—Memoirs of Baron Trenck, or Caroline de Lichfield,—and if that version have in it the zest and savour of original writing, we shall be sure to find the name of Thomas Holcroft in the title-page."—MISS MITFORD: vol. supra.

13. Posthumous Works of Frederic II., King of Prussia; from the French, 1789, 3 vols. 8vo. For this translation Holcroft is said to have received about £1200. See Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist. 14. Lavater's Essays on Physiognomy; from the German, 1793, 3 vols. large 8vo. 360 engravings; £5 5s. 15. Herman and Dorothea; from the German of Goethe, 1801, 8vo. In 1804 he pub. (16.) Travels from Hamburg, through Westphalia, Holland, and the Netherlands, to Paris, 1806, 2 vols. 4to.

"Upon the whole, we think that this book is a great deal too long, and that it has attained this magnitude by the most intrepid and extensive application of the approved recipe for book-making that has yet come under our consideration."—LOAN JOURNAL: Edin. Rev., iv. 84–99, q. v.

In 1815, 3 vols. 12mo, appeared (17.) his Memoirs written by himself, continued [by Wm. Haslitt, Sr.] to the time of his Death, from his Diary, Notes, and other Papers. A new ed. was pub. in Longman's Travellers' Library in 1851, in 2 Pts.; also in 1 vol.; and an abridgment will be found in Miss Mitford's Recollections of a Literary Life. See also Haslitt's First Acquaintance with Poets; Biog. Dramat.; and Lon. Gent. Mag. It is but justice to the memory of Holcroft to remark that he is said to have renounced his irreligious opinions when he found himself about visiting a world where they were not likely to prove of much benefit to him.

Holinshed, Holinshead, Holingshed, or Holynshed, Raphael, known by the valuable chronicles that go under his name, was descended from a family which lived at Bosely, in Cheshire, and died between 1578 and 1582; and this is all that has been ascertained respecting him. The Chronicles of Englands, Scotlande, and Ireland, Lon., 1577, 2 vols. fol. This is the first—or "Shakspeare" (so called because used by the great bard in the arrangement of some of his plots)—edition. It contains many wood-cuts, which were omitted and the language altered in the 2d edit., which appeared in 1586-87, 3 vols. fol.: commonly bound in two. This edit. was supervised, corrected, and enlarged by Abraham Fleming, and his brother Samuel assisted in compiling the elaborate index. Holinshed was not the sole author of these Chronicles. Vol. i. was partly composed by William Harrison, (q. v., pp. 793-794;) vol. ii. by Richard Stanihurst; John Hooker, alias Vowell; R. H. or W. H., (probably Wm. Harrison;) Francis Boterville, alias Thin; and others; vol. iii. by John Stow, Fr. Thin, Abr. Fleming, and others. Vol. i. gives us an Historical Description of Britain by Harrison, and the History of England, "from the time that it was first inhabited until the time that it was last conquered," by Holinshed. Vol. ii. contains the History of Ireland, by Holinshed, &c., to 1509, and from 1509 to 1586, by Stanihurst and Hooker; also the History of Scotland to 1571, by Holinshed; and from 1571 to 1586, by Boterville and others. Vol. iii. contains the History of England from William the Conqueror to 1577, by Holinshed; and from 1577 to 1586, by Stow, Fr. Thin, Fleming, and others.

"The Continuation from 1576 to 1586 contained several curious particulars, which gave great offence at the time of publication, and were accordingly suppressed, whereby, says Herbert, the paging from 1220 to 1276 is very irregular. According to Nicolson, they extend from 1491 to 1586. These are called the Castrations of Holinshed, and were republished by Dr. Drake, in 1728, in black-letter, in a thin folio volume. The curious, however, necessarily look sharply after the original pages. A copy of this kind was in the Harleian and another in Dr. Mead's collection."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

The credit of the plan of Holinshed's Chronicle seems to be due to Reginald Wolfe, the king's printer, who designed originally nothing less than a "universal Cosmography of the whole world." In 1807-08, 6 vols. 4to, appeared a new ed. of the Chronicles, in which the Castrations are restored. A copious Index—that rare luxury—adds to the value of this noble set of quartos. Copies are worth about £6 to £7, according to condition and binding. Copies of the 1st and 2d eds. have been sold for high prices. Of the 1st ed., Nassau's copy sold for £15 15s.; Steevens's for £22. Of the 2d ed., Steevens's sold for £23; Reed's for £23 10s.; the Roxburghe for £31 10s.; Willett's for £36 4s. 6d.; Sir Robert Smyth's for £40. We are now quoting the highest prices with which we are acquainted, with the exception of the remarkable copy (a large-paper, if there were any on large paper) in 4 vols., purchased by Richard Heber from Col. Stanley's collection for £63. The reprint of 1807-08 has diminished the value of the earlier edits. Hooker's trans. from the Latin of Giraldus's Conquest of England, in Holinshed's Chronicles, has been highly commended:

"Barry's topographical labours appear to the best advantage in Holinshed's Chronicle, translated and improved, with occasional notes, by John Hooker, alias Vowell, vol. ii., edit. 1586."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

The same authority remarks that Holinshed's Chronicles are

"By far the most popular and important of our historical records, in print, during the time of Queen Elizabeth; and from which, indeed, all modern historians have freely and largely borrowed."—Ubi supra.

"The chronicle of Holinshed is more full and complete than any of its predecessors, and less loaded with trifling matters. . . . The Description of England [Harrison's] prefixed to the first volume is the most interesting and valuable document, as a picture of the country, and of the costume and mode of living of its inhabitants, which the sixteenth century has produced." See Drake's Shakspeare and his Times.

"You would smile at my love of black-letter, were I to refer you to Holinshed or Stowe; men, I assure you, by no means despicable."—Dr. RICHARD FARMER: Let. to a Friend on the Study of Eng. Hist.

See also Biog. Brit.; Tanner's Bibliotheca; Bishop Nicolson's Hist. Lib.; Herbert's Typ. Antiq.; Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, i. 447, n.; Hallam's Constit. Hist. of Eng., 1854, i. 146, n., &c.

A little experience in such studies will replace the smile which Dr. Farmer feared by one of contentment and satisfaction, and the delighted black-letter student will not need much persuasion to induce him often to revel in "Our old monkish chronicles,—those authentic and amusing relations of passing occurrences, who carry the reader back with them by an irresistible spell to the days in which they lived and among the scenes and persons which they describe."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

If he wish to dive deep into these picturesque records of the past, we will aid him by a list of titles of a set of Chronicles formerly (perhaps yet) offered for sale by Mr. Henry G. Bohn, of Covent Garden, London:—1. FROIS-SART, by Col. Johnes, 4 vols. 2. MONSTRELET, by Col. Johnes, 4 vols. 3. ROBERT OF GLOUCESTER, 2 vols. 4. PETER LANGTOFT, 2 vols. 5. JOINVILLE'S MEMOIRS, 1 vol. 6. HOLINSHED, 6 vols. 7. GRAPTON, 2 vols. 8. WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, 1 vol. 9. HALL, 1 vol. 10. HARDYNG, 1 vol. 11. FABYAN, 1 vol. 12. FULLER'S WORTHIES, 2 vols. 13. ARNOLD and RASTELL, 1 vol. In all, 28 vols. r. 4to, reprints, 1803-15. This noble set of books is richly bound in olive morocco, gilt in the old style, marbled and gilt edges, by no less a workman than CLARKE. The price—say, there's the rub!—the price asked was £105. Another set, consisting of a portion only of these Chronicles, is described by Dibdin in his Library Companion, ed. 1825, p. 197.

The vol. sold in this way produced £801 12s. 6d. See Granger's Biog. Hist. of Eng.; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., and his Bibliog. Decameron; Brunet's Manual; Lowndes's Bibl. Manual. 2. Heroecologia Anglia, 1620, 2 vols. fol. This contains portraits (65 and frontispiece) of eminent Englishmen, 1500-1620, with short lives. The engravings are chiefly by Pass and Janson.

"This is the favourite volume of a thorough-bred Grangerite; who, without pity or remorse, plunges his trenchant scissors into the very abdomen of the tome."—Dibdin's Bibl. Decameron, q. v.: see also his Lib. Comp.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.

One of Edwards's copies, which had been Mariette's, (who had annexed to each portrait the name of the collection from whence it was taken,) was sold for £13; another of Edwards's, which had belonged to Buchelius, who wrote Latin verses under each portrait, was sold for £15; Willett's for £18; Williams's for £27 16s. 6d. But these are the highest prices with which we are acquainted. Mr. Joseph Lilly offers (in 1856) a fine copy, beautifully bound by Clarke and Bedford, for £12 12s.

The 3d ed. is noticed in the Westminster Review for January, 1856, where this invaluable guide is justly described as "A work which has done much to improve the general tone of thought upon medical subjects in the mind both of the profession and the public."

In the 1st and 2d eds. there were a few chapters on psychological subjects, which the author transferred to a separate volume, viz.: (4.) Chapters on Mental Physiology, 1852, p. 8vo. These have been replaced, in the 3d ed. of Medical Notes and Reflections, by four new chapters. The new ed. is also otherwise enlarged. 3d Amer. ed. of Medical Notes and Reflections, Phila., 1857, 8vo. This excellent work embodies the results of nearly forty years' active practice in London.

Hollis, John. 1. Reasons for Scepticism, 1796, 8vo. 2. Sequel to No. 1, Lon., 1799, 8vo.

Hollis, Thomas, 1720-1774, an ardent advocate of civil and religious liberty, was the great-nephew of Thomas Hollis, (1659-1731), the munificent benefactor of Harvard College. Indeed, not only is the latter entitled to that appellation, but his brothers John and Nathaniel, his nephew the second Thomas, his great-nephew the third Thomas, (the subject of this notice), and the heir of the third Thomas,—Thomas Brand Hollis,—were all contributors to this institution. The subject of this notice pub. at considerable expense—1. A new ed. of Toland's Life of Milton, 1761, 8vo. Edited, with Notes, by T. Hollis. This is the best ed. of Toland's Milton. 2. An accurate ed. of Algernon Sydney's Discourses concerning Government; with his Letters, Trial, Apology, and Memoirs of his Life, 1763, 4to. Edited by T. Hollis. 3. The Works of Algernon Sydney; a new ed., with Additions, by T. Hollis, 1772, r. 4to. 4. Joannis Wallisii Grammatica Lingue Anglicane, &c., 1765, 8vo. Hollis meditated an ed. of Andrew Marvell's Works, but did not carry out his design. He was an earnest promoter of the spirit of freedom in America, and aided in the republication of the political treatises of Mayhew, Otis, and John Adams. His Memoirs, compiled by the Rev. Francis Blackburn, Archdeacon of Cleveland, were privately printed by his friend and heir, Thomas Brand Hollis, (originally Thomas Brand,) in 1780, 2 vols. 4to; splendidly illustrated by Bartolozzi, Basire, &c., with portraits of Milton, Locke, Al-gernon Sydney, A. Marvel, Hutcheson, Hubert Languet, (author of the Vindicia contra Tyrannos, &c.) in all, 13 portraits and plates. The collector should look for a copy with the "starred pages," containing the severe review of Dr. Johnson's Life of Milton, and the portrait of Sir Isaac Newton. These pages (often deficient) occur between 532 and 585,—viz.: 533* to 576,* 579,* 580,* 577* to 584.* Such copies would formerly bring from £6 to £8, but can now (1856) be had for about £2. These vols. contain much curious information respecting Milton, &c. not to be found elsewhere, and correspondence with prominent Americans of the time. But note that these Memoirs are not to be confounded with the Memoirs of Thomas Brand Hollis, by John Disney, D.D., 1808, 4to; privately printed. Respecting the Hollises, see Memoirs as above; Gent. Mag., vol. lxxiv.; Colman's and Wigglesworth's Serms.; Greenwood's Discourse, and Rudd's Poem; Holmes; Morse's True Reasons; Allen's Amer. Biog. Diet.; Monthly Anthology for 1806; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Chalmers's Biog. Diet.; Dibdin's Lib. Comp.; Pierce's Hist. of Harvard Univ. from 1636 to the Amer. Revolution; Josiah Quincy's Hist. of do. 1636 to 1840, 2 vols. 1840, 8vo; Saml. A. Elliot's Sketch of the Hist. of do., and of its present state, 1848, 12mo; Judge Story's Life and Letters, ii. 125-127; Bost. Chris. Exam., (by J. Walker,) vii. 64; Spirit of the Pilgrims, ii. 581; Lon. Gent. Mag., Jan. 1849, p. 37; Disney, JOHN, (Museum Disneianum,) in this Dictionary.

"Such a library ["a working library," such as we wish ours to be] must be well provided with books of direct, positive utility. These are of two classes,—the great standard books which are never antiquated, and the valuable new books which are constantly appearing in every department of science and literature. Our library is amply supplied with many of the books belonging to the first class, thanks to the bounty of the Hollises and other noble benefactors in earlier or later days."—HON. EDWARD EVERETT: Aid to the Colleges, 1848: Orations and Speeches, 1848, ii. 547.

Originals, Physical and Theological, &c., 1750, 2 vols. 8vo. 4. Letter and Spirit; or, Annotations upon the Holy Scriptures according to both, 1753, 8vo.

"This work is Hutchinsonianism and Origenism in perfection. The whole volume is occupied with the book of Genesis, every word of which it spiritualises to absurdity. It is needless to wonder at the Fathers or the Mystics, when such elaborate productions as this and the Divine Originals, by the same author, have appeared in our own time."—Orme's Bibl. Bibl.

This poem refers to the commotions in the northern parts of the island in 1537, consequent upon the Reformation.

"It is a curious production, and, although disliked by Warton for its adherence to alliteration, is quoted by Hollinshed and mentioned in terms of praise by the learned Bale."—Bibl. Anglo-Poet., 147.

"Alliteration is here carried to the most ridiculous excess. . . . The poem, probably from its political reference, is mentioned by Hollinshed. Bale, who overlooks the author's poetry in his piety, thinks that he has learnedly and perspicuously discussed the absurdities of popery."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

Holmes, Major. Pendulum Watches; Phil. Trans., 1665.

Holmes, Abiel, D.D., 1763-1837, a native of Woodstock, Connecticut, graduated at Yale College in 1783, and shortly afterwards became tutor in that institution; pastor of a congregation in Midway, Georgia, 1788-91; pastor of the First Congregational Church, Cambridge, Mass., 1792-1832. In addition to the work by which he is best known.—The Annals of America.—Dr. Holmes was author of a Life of President Ezra Styles, (father of his first wife;) pub., in 1798, a Memoir of the French Protestants, and a Hist. of the Town of Cambridge, in Mass. Hist. Collec.; and about thirty sermons and historical treatises. Dr. Holmes was first married in 1790 to Mary, daughter of Dr. Ezra Styles, President of Yale College. She died in 1795, leaving no children. In 1800 he married Sarah, daughter of the Hon. Oliver Wendell, of Boston, and had issue—1. Mary Jackson, married to Usher Parsons, M.D.; 2. Ann Susan, married to the Hon. Charles Wentworth Upham; 3. Sarah Lathrop, who died in childhood; 4. Oliver Wendell Holmes, M.D., one of the most popular of American poets and wits, (vide post); 5. John Holmes, of Cambridge. For further particulars respecting this excellent man and accurate historian, see Dr. Jenks's Funeral Sermon; Duyekins's Cyc. of Amer. Lit.; American Almanac, 1838, 316-317; Mass. Hist. Collec., vol. vii. Dr. Holmes's American Annals, or a Chronological History of America from its Discovery in 1492 to 1806, was pub. at Cambridge, Mass., in 1805, 2 vols. 8vo. It was reviewed with considerable severity by Robert Southey, in the London Quarterly for Nov. 1809, iv. 319-337. An ed. was pub. in London by Sherwood in 1813, 2 vols. 8vo. A new ed., with a continuation, under the title of The Annals of America, &c. to the year 1826, was put forth at Cambridge, Mass., in 1829, 2 vols. 8vo, "with such improvements as leave nothing to desire."

"The new edition of the American Annals is one of the best works of the kind ever published. Every thing of importance relating to the history of America is related in the order in which it happened, in a clear and concise manner, with copious and interesting notes, in which references are made to the most important authorities, by which the reader who wishes for more extensive information on the subject may gratify his curiosity without the trouble of turning over a great number of volumes."—Rich's Bibl. Amer. Novæ, 2. 66, 217.

"Dr. Holmes's American Annals is a work of great industry and research, and is an invaluable treasure to the future writers of American history, but claims no merit but that of faithful compilation."—Sketches of the Lit. of the U. States, by Rev. Timothy Flint; Lon. Athenæum, 1835, p. 803.

"This new edition of the American Annals, with such improvements as the author has introduced into it, we consider among the most valuable productions of the American press. . . . In the American Annals it is the author's exclusive object to embody facts, drawn from what he deems the best authorities, and selected according to the mature light of his judgment. In this aim he seems to us eminently successful, especially when it is considered through what a vast field he has ranged, and what difficulties he must have encountered in collecting his materials and fixing his choice. . . . It is the best repository of historical, chronological, and biographical knowledge respecting America that can be found embodied in one work."—JAMES SPARKS: N. Amer. Rev., xxix. 428-441; Oct. 1829.

"A valuable work, displaying great industry and research."—Lowndes's Bibl. Man.

"The name of Holmes ought not to be mentioned without a tribute to his memory. No student of our history but owes him gratitude. The accomplished annalist feared no labour; he was indefatigable in his love of truth. He had seen much of the country; his correspondence was wide, his seal untrifling. . . . Take it all in all, the Annals of Holmes constitute a work which in its kind has never been equalled among us, and has few parallels anywhere."—N. Amer. Rev. xli. 431; April, 1838.

Holmes's Annals has now (1856) become a liber variæ, and can rarely be purchased. Our copy was a present from our enterprising publisher and valued friend, Mr. George W. Childs, of Philadelphia, whose excellent collection of works on American History is well calculated to excite the cupidity of the ravished spectator.

Holmes, Oliver Wendell, M.D., a son of Abiel Holmes, D.D., b. at Cambridge, Massachusetts, Aug. 29, 1809, graduated at Harvard University in 1829, and subsequently devoted about a year to the study of law. In 1833 he visited Europe, and—having resolved to exchange Coke and Blackstone for Galen and Æsculapius—employed between two and three years in attendance on the hospitals of Paris, and other laborious researches connected with the duties of his new profession. In 1835 he returned to Boston, took his medical degree at Cambridge in 1836, was elected Professor of Anatomy and Physiology in Dartmouth College in 1838, and succeeded Dr. Warren as Professor of Anatomy in the Medical Department of Harvard University in 1847. In 1849 Dr. Holmes relinquished general practice. He resides during the winter principally in Boston, and spends the remainder of the year on an estate which once belonged to his great-grandfather, the Hon. Jacob Wendell, situated on the banks of the Housatonic, in Pittsfield, Berkshire county, Massachusetts.

Some of the earlier poetical productions of this popular poet originally appeared in The Collegian, a periodical pub. in 1830 by a number of the students of Harvard University; in Illustrations of the Athenæum Gallery of Paintings, 1831; and in The Harbinger, a May Gift, 1833. In 1836 Dr. Holmes delivered, before the Harvard Phi Beta Kappa Society, Poetry, a Metrical Essay,—which established his reputation as a poet.

"It is in the heroic measure, and in its verification is not surpassed by any poem written in this country. It relates to the nature and offices of poetry, and is itself a series of brilliant illustrations of the ideas of which it is an expression."—Grisevold's Poets and Poetry of America.

This Metrical Essay—a very successful essay it proved —was pub. in the first collective ed. of his Poems issued at Boston, in 1836, 12mo, pp. 163. In 1843 he gave to the world Teipsichore, a poem, read at the annual dinner of the Phi Beta Kappa Society in that year; and in 1846 he pub. Urania, a Rhymed Lesson, pronounced before the Mercantile Library Association. A review of Urania, by Francis Bowen, will be found in the N. Amer. Rev. for January, 1847, lxiv. 208-216:

"His fancy teems with bright and appropriate images, and these are woven into his plan usually with exquisite finish and grace. His artistic merits are very great; his versification is never slovenly, nor his diction meagre or coarse; and many of his shorter pieces are inwrought with so much fire and imagination as to rank among our best lyrics."—Ubi supra.

In 1838 Dr. Holmes pub. Boylston Prize Dissertations for 1836-37: On Indigenous Intermittent Fever in New England; Nature and Treatment of Neuralgia; and Utility and Importance of Direct Exploration in Medical Practice, Bost., 8vo. A review of these Essays, by E. Hale, will be found in the N. Amer. Rev. for July, 1838, xlvii. 161-177:

"It affords a proof of his [Dr. Holmes's] industry, as well as of his talents, that the author should be successful in obtaining three prizes in two successive years, gaining in the latter year both that were offered."—Ubi supra.

His Lectures on Homoeopathy and its Kindred Delusions appeared in 1842, and a Report of his on Medical Literature to the National Medical Association was pub. in the Trans. of Nat. Med. Society for 1848. To these professional labours are to be added a pamphlet entitled Puerperal Fever as a Private Pestilence, (noticed in Boston Living Age, xlv. 18;) a number of papers in the New England Quarterly Journal of Medicine and Surgery, and in the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal; and (in conjunction with Jacob Bigelow, M.D.) an ed. of Dr. Marshall Hall's Principles of the Theory and Practice of Medicine, 1839, 8vo. He has also been a contributor of miscellaneous articles to the N. Amer. Rev., the New England Mag., the Knickerbocker, &c. We have already stated that the first collective ed. of Holmes's poems was pub. at Boston, (by Otis, Broaders & Co.,) 1836, 12mo, pp. 163. A second Amer. ed. was pub. by Ticknor & Fields (so the firm now runs) in 1848; and this enterprising house has pub. one or more edits. every year since. Three times in the present year (1856) has the press been put in motion to supply the public demand. The first English ed. was pub. in 1845; a new ed. by Routledge in 1852, 32mo; and a third by the same publisher in 1853, 18mo. Astraea, the Balance of Illusions, a Poem delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Yale College, August, 1850, was pub. in the same year, 16mo, and again in 1855, 16mo. A notice of this production, with copious extracts, will be found in the thirty-first chapter of Miss Mitford's Literary Recollections; and see also the Knickerbocker Mag., xxxvii. 142. Miss Mitford seems to have been indebted for her copy of Astraea (and also for a copy of the author's collected poems) to her friend,—Holmes's friend, our friend, everybody's friend,—James T. Fields, Esq., the poet-publisher of Boston. (See page 595 of this Dictionary.) For other notices of Holmes's poems, see N. Amer. Rev., notice of collective edit. of 1836, by J. G. Palfrey, xlv. 275-277; ibid., notice of collective ed. of 1849, by Francis Bowen, lxviii. 201-203; articles by J. G. Whittier, in Knickerbocker, xxvi. 570; Bost. Liv. Age, (from the National Era), xx. 516; notices of the second English ed., in Lon. Athenaeum, 1852, 815; and in the Irish Quar. Rev. for June, 1855. See also E. P. Whipple's Essays and Reviews, 1851, i. 66-67, and in N. Amer. Rev., January, 1844; Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America; Duyckinck's Cyc. of Amer. Lit.; (in the two last-named works will be found specimens of our author's peculiar powers;) Hillard's First Class Reader; Chambers's Hand-Book of American Literature; Tuckerman's Sketch of American Literature.

We quote a few lines from the many pages of enthusiastic laudation now before us:

"The most concise, apt, and effective poet of the school of Pope this country has produced is Oliver Wendell Holmes. . . . His best lines are a series of rhymed pictures, witticisms, or sentiments, let off with the precision and brilliancy of the scintillations that sometimes illuminate the northern horizon. The significant terms, the perfect construction, and acute choice of syllables and emphasis, render some passages of Holmes absolute models of versification, especially in the heroic measure. Besides these artistic merits, his poetry abounds with fine satire, beautiful delineations of nature, and amusing caricatures of manners. The long poems are metrical essays more pointed, musical, and judicious, as well as witty, than any that have appeared, of the same species, since the Essay on Man and the Dunciad."—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN: ubi supra.

"Dr. Holmes is a poet of wit and humour and genial sentiment, with a style remarkable for its purity, terseness, and point, and for an exquisite finish and grace. His lyrics ring and sparkle like cataracts of silver; and his serious pieces—as successful in their way as those mirthful frolics of his muse for which he is best known—arrest the attention by touches of the most genuine pathos and tenderness. All his poems illustrate a manly feeling, and have in some of them a current of good sense, the more charming because somewhat out of fashion now in works of imagination and fancy."—R. W. GAISSWOLD: ubi supra.

"To write good comic verse is a different thing from writing good comic poetry. A jest or a sharp saying may be easily made to rhyme; but to blend ludicrous ideas with fancy and imagination, and display in their conception and expression the same poetic qualities usually exercised in serious composition, is a rare distinction. Among American poets, we know of no one who excels Holmes in this difficult branch of the art. Many of his pleasant lyrics seem not so much the offspring of wit, as of fancy and sentiment turned in a humorous direction. His manner of satirizing the follies, follies, vanities, and affectations of conventional life is altogether peculiar and original. . . . Holmes is also a poet of sentiment and passion. . . . Those who know him only as a comic lyricist, as the libellous laureate of chirping folly and presumptuous egotism, would be surprised at the clear sweetness and skylark thrill of his serious and sentimental compositions."—EDWIN P. WHIPPLE: ubi supra.

"His longest productions are occasional poems which have been recited before literary societies and received with very great favour. His style is brilliant, sparkling, and terse; and many of his heroic stanzas remind us of the point and condensation of Pope. In his shorter poems, he is sometimes grave and sometimes gay. When in the former mood, he charms us by his truth and manliness of feeling, and his sweetness of sentiment; when in the latter, he delights us with the glance and play of the wildest wit and the richest humour. Every thing that he writes is carefully finished, and rests on a basis of sound sense and shrewd observation."—GEORGE S. HILLARD: ubi supra.

"If any of your readers (and at times we fear it is the case with all) need amusement, and the wholesome alternative of a hearty laugh, we commend them not to Dr. Holmes the physician, but to Dr. Holmes the scholar, the wit, and the humourist; not to the scientific medical professor's barbarous Latin, but to his practical prescriptions given in choice old Saxon. We have tried them, and are ready to give the doctor certificates of their efficacy. . . . Long may he live, to make broader the face of our care-ridden generation, and to realise for himself the truth of the wise man's declaration, that a merry heart is 'a continual feast.'"—JOHN G. WHITTIER: National Era.

"You went crazy last year over Bulwer's New Timon: Why, if B., to the day of his dying, should rhyme on, Heaping verses on verses, and tomes upon tomes, He could ne'er reach the best point and vigour of Holmes. His are just the fine hands, too, to weave you a lyric Full of fancy, fun, feeling, or spiced with satire, In so kindly a measure, that nobody knows What to do but e'en join in the laugh, friends and foes."

J. RUSSELL LOWELL: A Fable for Critics.

"As he is everybody's favorite, there is no occasion for critics to meddle with him, either to censure or to praise. He can afford to laugh at the whole reviewing fraternity. His wit is all his own, so sly and tingling, but without a drop of ill-nature in it, and never leaving a sting behind. His humour is so grotesque and queer, that it reminds one of the frolics of Puck; and deep pathos mingles with it so naturally, that, when the reader's eyes are brimming with tears, he knows not whether they have their source in sorrow or in laughter. The great merits of his English style we noticed on a former occasion, [N. Amer. Rev., lxiv. 208-216:] for point, idiomatic propriety, and terseness, it is absolutely without a rival."—FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lxviii. 201-203.

It is now time to inquire into the character of the reception which our author's poetry has encountered on the other side of the Atlantic, where critics may be supposed to scan with a less indulgent eye the pretensions of American authorship. Miss Mitford, in her chapter on AMERICAN POETS, already referred to, remarks,

"Of all this flight of genuine poets, I hardly know any one so original as Dr. Holmes. For him we can find no living prototype: to track his footsteps, we must travel back as far as Pope or Dryden; and to my mind it would be well if some of our bards would take the same journey,—provided always it produced the same result. Lofty, poignant, graceful, grand, high of thought and clear of word, we could fancy ourselves reading some pungent page of Abraham and Achitophel, or of the Moral Epistles, if it were not for the pervading nationality, which, excepting Whittier, American poets have generally wanted, and for that true reflection of the manners and follies of the age, without which satire would fall alike of its purpose and its name. . . . He excels in singing his own charming songs, and speaks as well as he writes."

"In the lighter poems of Holmes, humour is generally blended with good taste. His versification is easy and fluent, and rises to dignity and chastened elegance in his serious and didactic poems; which suggest that the writer, devoting his life to literature, might have achieved greater works."—CHAMBERS'S Hand-Book of American Literature, London and Edinburgh, 1856.

"There are many things in Holmes's humorous pieces which bear strong resemblance to the similar productions of our English satirists, Swift, Pope, and Thomas Hood. He possesses Swift's quaintness and motley merriment, Pope's polish and graceful point, and the solemn pathos and allied excruciating mirth of Hood. In addition to these, he has a certain originality of his own, which would be difficult to define, but which would seem to consist in freedom and facility ingrafted on the broad, hearty nature of Brother Jonathan."—Irish Quarterly Review, v. 216-220: Review of the second English ed. (1852) of Holmes's Poems.

We find the same vol. thus noticed by a famous London periodical, the severity of whose critical judgments has long made its name a terror to authorship on both sides of the Atlantic:

"There are strains of didactic thought, humorous fancy, pathetic feeling,—there is an Augustan sonority and neatness of versification,—in the poems of Dr. Holmes, which by turns remind us of the Prize-Poets of our Colleges:—of Crabbe, who minutely wrought out the homeliest themes in heroic metre,—of William Spencer's drawing-room lyrics, light as gossamer, sentimental as music on a lake,—and of Whistcraft. Yet there is nothing like gross or direct imitation in this worthy little volume."—Lon. Athenæum, 1862, p. 616.

Dr. Holmes was one of the principal parties in organizing the Atlantic Monthly, and contributed to its first twelve numbers a series of papers entitled the "Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table," which were exceedingly popular, and were pub. in a vol. illustrated by Hoppin, Boston, 1858, 12mo.

"The 'Autocrat' is as genial and gentle, and, withal, as philosophical, an essayist as any of modern times. Hazlitt, naturalist and cynical, would yet have loved this writer. Charles Lamb would have opened his heart to one who resembles him so much in many excellent points. Leigh Hunt, we dare say, has been much delighted with him. Thomas Hood, the great humanitarian, would have relished his fine catholic spirit. Dickens, no doubt, has read him more than once, admiring his command of our common language,—the 'well of English undefiled';—and, above all, the pervading tone of practical philosophy. The 'Autocrat,' however, is somewhat more than an essayist: he is contemplative, discursive, poetical, thoughtful, philosophical, amusing, imaginative, tender,—never didactic. This is the secret of his marked success; he interests variously-constituted minds and various moods of mind. It needed not the introduction of lyrical pieces (which we are glad to have) to show that the 'Autocrat' is essentially a poet. Of all who would have most enjoyed him we may foremost name Professor Wilson, who would have welcomed him to a seat 'above the salt' at the far-famed 'Noctes Ambrosianæ,' placing him next to William Maginn, the wayward 'O'Dobery' of Blackwood's Magazine."—Dr. R. SHERIDAN MACKENZIE.

Holmes, Robert, D.D., 1749–1805, a native of Hampshire, educated at New College, Oxford, became Rector of Staunton, Canon of Salisbury, and, in 1804, Dean of Winchester. Holt, John. See HOGRA.

Holt, Sir John, 1642–1710, Lord Chief-Justice of the King's Bench, 1689–1710, was a native of Thame, Yorkshire, educated at Oriel Coll., Oxford, and entered at Gray's Inn, 1658. 1. Reports of Cases determined by Sir John Holt, 1681–1710, from a MS. of Thos. Farreley, &c., Lon., 1736, fol.

"Farreley was the author of 7th Modern, a book of but indifferent authority. The merits of the present work, I believe, are in a concatenation accordingly."—Wallace's Reports, 247, ed. 1856.

6th and 7th Modern both contain Reports of Holt's Judgments:

"He complained bitterly of his reporters, saying that the inimbecile stuff which they published would 'make posterity think ill of his understanding and that of his brethren on the bench.' He chiefly referred to a collection of Reports called Mosses, embracing nearly the whole of the time when he sat on the bench,—which are composed in a very loose and perfunctory manner. More justice is done to him by Salkeld, Cartwright, Levinge, Shower, and Skinner; but these do little more than state dryly the points which he decided, and we should have been left without any adequate memorial of his judicial powers, had it not been for admirable Reports of his decisions published after his death. These, beginning with Easter Term, 6 W. & M., were compiled by Lord Raymond, who was his pupil, and who became his successor. Many of them are distinguished by animation as well as precision, and they form a delightful treat to the happy few who have a genuine taste for judicial science."—LORD CAMPBELL: Lives of the Chief-Justices.

It is known to the profession that Lord Mansfield and several other judges doubt the accuracy of the beginning of Raymond's first vol.; but this is a veraxa questio, which we shall let the lawyers decide, or, rather, discuss. The dictum of a layman would have but little weight in the controversy. The vol. entitled Cases and Resolutions of Cases, &c., 1742, 8vo, is sometimes cited as Cases Tempore Holt; though that title is generally used to distinguish Farreley's folio, 1738. We must not forget to mention that in 1837, 8vo, there was pub. from the original MSS., with an Introduction, Lord Holt's Judgments in the Case of Ashby v. White and others, and J. Paty and others. In 1708, Lord Holt edited a collection of Crown Cases, from the MS. of Chief-Justice Kelynge, adding three judgments of his own, all of which are upon the law of murder and manslaughter:

"His notice of them in his preface rather shows that he was an instance of a great English lawyer being utterly unacquainted with English composition."—LORD CAMPBELL: ubi supra.

A new ed. of the above folio, or rather a new title-page, was pub. in 1739. Respecting this great judge, in addition to authorities above cited, consult his Life, 1764, 8vo; Biog. Brit., vol. vii., Supp.; Burnet's Own Times; Athen. Oxon.; Nichols's Atterbury; Marvin's Leg. Bibl.; Tatler, No. 14; art. on Law-School at Cambridge, by Dr. Charles Follen, in N. Amer. Rev., xxxvi. 395–418. One of Holt's most celebrated judgments is that of Cogge v. Barnard,

"In which the law of bailments is expounded with philosophic precision and fulness. . . . And, if he had left no other judgment on record, this alone would justify the eulogy of an eminent modern jurist, that 'he was as great a lawyer as ever sat in Westminster Hall.'"—JURIST SROAT: Progress of Jurisprudence: Miscell. Writings, 1852, 204.

Holt deserves great credit for his courageous guardianship of the legal rights of the people in opposition to the tyrannical measures of King James II. This was not forgotten by the succeeding government. An eminent authority of the times of Holt, referring to the manner in which the Revolution judges were selected, remarks:

"The first of these was Sir John Holt, made Lord Chief-Justice of England, then a young man for so high a post, who maintained it all his time with a great reputation for capacity, integrity, courage, and despatch."—BURNET BURNER: Own Times.

"He was a man of profound knowledge of the laws of his country, and as just an observer of them in his own person."—Tufts, No. 14.

"A man of unsullied honour, of profound learning, and of the most enlightened understanding."—LORD CAMPBELL: ubi supra.
 "On the intimate connection of these two codes, [those of Rome and England,] let us hear the words of Lord Holt, whose name never can be pronounced without veneration, as long as wisdom and integrity are revered among men."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: On the Study of the Law of Nature and Nations; *Miscell. "Its object principally is to impress accurately and distinctly upon the mind the meaning of the technical terms of the law; and as such it can hardly fail to be generally useful. There is much curious information to be found in it in regard to the peculiarities of the ancient Saxon law. The additions of the American edition [Mr. Pennington's] give increased value to the work, and evince much accuracy and taste."—Penns. Law Jour.

Home, Sir Everard, Bart., President Royal Coll. of Surgeons, 1756–1832, a native of Greenlaw Castle, county of Berwick, Scotland, studied medicine with his brother-in-law, the celebrated John Hunter, and practised in London with great success for more than five years. Among his contributions to medical literature are Observations on the Treatment of Ulcers on the Legs, 1797; On Cancer, 1805; On Strictures of the Urethra, &c., 3 vols. 8vo; on the Prostate Gland, 2 vols. 8vo; many papers in *Phil. "The six volumes taken together are filled with researches that were begun at seventeen, and have been uninterruptedly continued to seventy,—a period of fifty-five years. It is to the late John Hunter I owe the love of the pursuit; and his example, both of application and the mode of investigation, I have never lost sight of. To him I am indebted for the rich stores which he placed before me, which it has been the height of my ambition to increase."—Author's Preface.

Official investigations have left no doubt remaining that Sir Everard did, indeed, "owe to the late John Hunter" more than was generally supposed.

Home, Henry, Lord Kames, 1696–1782, a native of the county of Berwick, Scotland, was for some time a writer to the Signet, was called to the Bar in 1724, made a Judge of the Court of Session in 1752, when, according to custom, he took the title of Lord Kames; appointed one of the Lords of Justiciary in 1763. He cultivated the large estate of Blair-Drummond, in Perthshire, of which he became possessed in right of his wife. Lord Kames was noted for great public spirit; and his cheerfulness of temper, combined with a vast amount of information on literary, political, and agricultural topics, made him a general favourite in society. The reader will be greatly interested in A. F. Tytler's (Lord Woodhouselee) Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Hon. Henry Home, of Kames; with a Supp., Edin., 1807–10, 2 vols. 4to; Lon., 1814, 3 vols. 8vo. His life was also pub. by Wm. Smellie: (see Gazetteer, John, p. 737.) 1. "The Elements of Criticism, considered as the first systematical attempt to investigate the metaphysical principles of the fine arts, possesses, in spite of its numerous defects both in point of taste and of philosophy, infinite merits, and will ever be regarded as a literary wonder by those who know how small a portion of his time it was possible for the author to allot to the composition of it, amidst the imperious and multifarious duties of a most active and useful life."—*DUGALD STEWART: 1st. Home, James, Advocate. The Scripture Hist. of the Jews and their Republic, Lon., 1737, 2 vols. 8vo. An excellent work. Recommended by Bishop Tomline, in his Elements of Christian Theology.

Home, John, 1724–1808, the author of Douglas, was a native of Ancrum, Roxburghshire, Scotland, educated at the University of Edinburgh, and licensed to preach in the Church of Scotland in 1747. In December, 1756, his (1.) Tragedy of Douglas was presented at the theatre in the Canongate, Edinburgh.

"It was received with enthusiastic applause, and, in the conclusion, drew forth many tears, which were perhaps a more unequivocal testimony to its merits. The town was in an uproar of exultation that a Scotsman should write a tragedy of the first rate, and that its merits were first submitted to them."

But the successful author was soon reminded that he was exercising his genius in a forbidden field; and he found it expedient to anticipate his expected degradation from the ministerial office by abdicating his pulpit, which he did in June, 1757. It is perhaps worthy of notice that the representation of Douglas elicited Dr. Witherspoon's Serious Inquiry into the Nature and Effects of the Stage. Mr. Home now found a powerful patron in Lord Bute, who procured him a pension of £300, and the sinecure office of Conservator of the Scotch Privileges at Campvere, in Zealand, which doubled his income. Home had some early military experience as a volunteer against the Pretender in 1745, and in 1788 he received a captain's commission, which he held until the peace, in the Duke of Buccleugh's regiment of militia,—the Fencibles. In March, 1757, against the judgment of Garrick, Douglas was produced at Covent-Garden, and soon attained that popularity which it has since enjoyed. The latter part of the author's life was passed at East Lothian and in the city of Edinburgh, where he played the hospitable landlord until his death in 1808, at the advanced age of 86. He was the author of five Tragedies, in addition to Douglas, (pub., Lon., 1757, 8vo;) viz.: 2. Agis, 1758, 8vo; 3. The Siege of Aquileia, 1760, 8vo; 4. The Fatal Discovery, 1769, 8vo; 5. Alonzo, 1773, 8vo; 6. Alfred, 1778, 8vo. Home's Dramatic Works were pub. in 1760, 12mo, and at Edin., 1798, 2 vols. 12mo. These plays cannot compare with Douglas.

"Home's other tragedies are all very indifferent,—most of them quite bad. Mr. Mackenzie should not have disturbed their slumbers."—JOHN WILSON: Notes Ambrosianae, April, 1832.

"It may, perhaps, seem strange that the author, in his preceding tragedy of Agis, and in his subsequent dramatic efforts, so far from attaining similar excellence, never even approached to the success of Douglas; yet good reasons can be assigned for his failure, without imputing it, during his best years at least, to a decay of genius."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Life and Works of John Home, Lon. Quar. Rev., June, 1827; and in Scott's Prose Works, q. v.

This article is a review of the Works of John Home, Esq., now first collected, to which is prefixed an account of his Life and Writings, by Henry Mackenzie, Edin., 1822, 3 vols. 8vo. To this work we refer the reader for further particulars connected with the biography and literary labours of our author. See also Noctes Ambrosianae, April, 1822.

Home also pub. the History of the Rebellion in 1745, 4to, 1802, which we shall notice hereafter. The merits of Douglas, notwithstanding the assertion of Dr. Johnson "that there were not ten good lines in the whole play," have been repeatedly acknowledged by the most competent critics. That this laudation has been sometimes carried to a ridiculous excess can hardly be questioned; as, for instance, in the eulogy of David Hume, the historian, who, in his Four Dissertations addressed to Home, compliments him as the possessor of "The true theatrie genius of Shakspeare and Otway; refined from the unhappy barbarism of the one and licentiousness of the other."

Here doubtless the Scotsman speaks as well as the critic, and patriotic enthusiasm must not surprise us when warmed with a theme so congenial and so flattering:

"The genius of Home was national; and so, too, was the subject of his justly-famous Tragedy of Douglas. He had studied the old Ballads; their simplicities were sweet to him as wall-flowers on ruins. On the story of Gill Morice, who was an Earl's son, he founded the Tragedy which surely no Scottish eyes ever witnessed without tears."—JOHN WILSON: Recreations of Christopher North: An Hour's Talk about Poetry.

"I think nobody can bestow too much praise on Douglas. There has been no English tragedy worthy of the name since it appeared."—Ibid.: Noctes Ambrosianae, April, 1822.

Whilst this perhaps appears somewhat extravagant, yet one of the best parts of this play is commended by two eminent modern critics in terms quite as eulogistic:

"We agree with Mr. Mackenzie, that the chief scene between Lady Randolph and Old Norval, in which the preservation and existence of Douglas is discovered, has no equal in modern, and scarcely a superior in the ancient, drama. It is certainly one of the most effective which the English stage has to boast; and we learn with pleasure, but without surprise, that, though many other parts of the play were altered before its representation, we have this master-piece exactly as it was thrown off in the original sketch. 'Thus it is,' says the accomplished editor, 'that the fervid creation of genius and fancy strikes out what is so excellent as well as vivid as not to admit of amendment, and which, indeed, correction would spoil instead of improving.' This is the true inspiration of the poet, which gives to criticism, instead of borrowing from it, its model and rule, and which, it is possible, in some different authors, the terrors of critics may have weakened or extinguished."

"The memory of Mr. Home, as an author, depends, in England, almost entirely upon the tragedy of Douglas, which not only retains the most indisputable possession of the stage, but produces a stronger effect on the feelings of the audience, when the parts of Douglas and Lady Randolph are well filled, than almost any tragedy since the days of Otway. . . . The language of the piece is beautiful. 'Mrs. Siddons told me,' says the editor, [Mr. Mackenzie,] 'that she never found any study' (which, in the technical language of the stage, means the getting verses by heart) 'so easy as that of Douglas, which is one of the best criterions of excellence in the dramatic style.'"—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Life and Works of John Home, ubi supra.

Home's History of the Rebellion in 1745—to which we promised to return—gave great dissatisfaction, not only as regarded its literary character, but in its deficiency in historical accuracy:

"Since Mr. Home did assume the pen on the subject of the Forty-five, no consideration whatever ought to have made him depart from the truth, or shrink from exposing the cruelties practised, as Mr. Mackenzie delicately expresses it, by some subordinate officers, or from executing the impolitic and ungenerous use of the victory of Culloden in which the Duke of Cumberland was somewhat implicated. Mr. Home ought either never to have written his history, or to have written it without clogging himself with the dedication to the sovereign. . . . The disappointed public of Scotland, to which the history should have been most interesting, was clamorous in its disapprobation. They complained of suppressed information and servile corrections. . . . The history is, nevertheless, so far as it goes, a fair and candid one for the writer, though, by the manner in which he had fettered himself, he was debarred from speaking the whole truth, yet was incapable of speaking any thing but the truth."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: ubi supra.

"Any account of that brilliant episode in our history must needs be full of interest, and Home, being concerned so far himself, has preserved a number of picturesque enough anecdotes; but, on the whole, the book wants vigour, and it is full of quibbles. What can be more absurd than his giving us more pages about the escape of two or three Whig students of Divinity from the Castle of Doune than he spends upon all the wild wanderings of the unfortunate Chevalier!"—JOHN WILSON: Noctes Ambrosianae, April, 1822.

Yet Home's History must by no means be neglected by the historical student:

"The work of Home was not entirely such as we might have expected from one who was not only an actor in the scene, but the author of a tragedy like Douglas, elegant enough to have pleased on the French stage, and yet affecting enough to succeed on ours. The History of the Rebellion was a work which had been meditated so long, that it was delivered to the world too late,—when the writer was no longer what he once was. But I recommend it to your perusal, because it has all the marks of authenticity,—possesses, I think, more merit than is generally supposed,—treats of a very remarkable event in our history,—and is, after all, entertaining, and not long."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.

Homer, Rev. Henry, 1752–1791, an eminent classical scholar, educated at and Fellow of Emanuel College, Cambridge, pub. an Essay upon the Inclosure of Common Fields, Lon., 1766, 8vo; an Inquiry rel. to Public Roads, Oxf., 1767, 8vo; and edited several Latin authors, the best-known of which is the Entire Works of Horace, Lon., 1792, 2 vols. 4to,—the joint production of Mr. Homer and Dr. Combe; pub. at £6 6s. This beautiful work has been already noticed: see COMBE, CHARLES, M.D.; Diddin's Greek and Latin Classics; Chalmers's Biog. Diet.; Lon. Gent. Mag., vols. lxxvi., lxxx.; Brit. The text of Combe and Homes's ed. of Horace is formed on the basis of Gesner's ed., and the work is enriched by a collation of the editio princeps in the Royal Library, and seven Harleian MSS. The notes are taken principally from Craquius, Lambinus, Torrentius, Sanadon, Bentley, Cunningham, Baxter, Gesner, Klotzius, Janus, Waddelus, Wakefield, &c. As regards the physique of the work, it is to be commended for the brightness of the paper, the amplitude of the margin, and the beauty of the type.

This bears the imprimatur of Joseph Caryl, and a commendatory Preface by Peter Sterry. In 1661, fol., Holmes pub. Ten Exercitations in Vindication of the Resurrection Revealed. A new ed. of these vols., compressed into one, with the repetitious and extraneous matter omitted, edited by the Rev. J. W. Brooks, was pub. in 1833, 8vo. Thomas Hall pub. a Confutation of the Millenarian Opinion, in reply to Dr. Holmes, in 1657, 12mo. Sixteen of Holmes's theolog. treatises were pub. in a fol. vol. in 1652, and the same, with a new title, in 1669. See Athen. Oxon. for an account of this author and his works. Holmes's work on the Resurrection is by no means to be neglected by the Biblical student. We have seen that he advocates the doctrine of an earthly millennium.

"This is far from being a contemptible book, though the author ranked among the visionaries of his time. . . . The learning of the author was evidently extensive, and his knowledge of the Scriptures, particularly of the prophecies, very considerable. A great deal of discussion respecting the meaning of many difficult passages occurs in the book, which will sometimes, perhaps, amuse, but may very often instruct, the reader. He is far from being so carnal in his views as his leading sentiment would prepare us to expect."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

Hone, William, d. 1842, aged 63, a native of Bath, for many years a publisher and bookseller in London, and latterly an Independent minister at Weigh-house Chapel, Bastoheap, pub. some profane parodies, The Apocryphal New Testament, and a number of other works, of which the Every-Day Book, 1826, The Table-Book, 1827-28, and The Year-Book, 1829, are the best known. His Apocryphal New Testament (for an account of which, see Horne's Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures, and the Lon. Quar. Rev., vols. xxv. and xxx.) was pub. in 1820, 8vo; 2d ed., 1821, 8vo; his Ancient Mysteries, in 1823, 8vo; and his own account of his Early Life and Conversion, in 1841, 8vo. Of his political pieces, which were numerous, the satire entitled The Political House that Jack Built was the most popular, and went through no less than fifty edits. He also edited an edit. of Strutt's Sports and Pastimes. See an account of his life and literary labours in Lon. Gent. Mag., January, 1843. The Every-Day Book, The Table-Book, and The Year-Book, of which there have been several edits.,—the last in 1857, 4 vols. 8vo, 730 wood-cuts,—cannot be too highly commended. Sir Walter Scott, Lamb,—who contributed some of the contents,—Southey, and John Wilson, Horace Smith and others, all unite in their praise:

"Reader, did you ever see Hone's Every-Day Book? You cannot do better than buy it directly. . . . You will meet with . . . spirit-stirring descriptions of old customs, delightful wood-cuts of old buildings, as well as many a fine secret learned among the woods and fields, and whispered by the 'seasons' difference.' . . . He has deserved well of the naturalist, the antiquarian, and the poet, by his Every-Day and also by his Table-Book."—CHRISTOPHER NORTH: Blackwood's Mag., xxvii. 260.

"By-the-by, I have bought Hone's Every-Day Book and his Table-Book, and am sorry I had not seen them before my colloquies were printed, that I might have given him a good word there. I have not seen any miscellaneous books that are so well worth having; brimful of curious matter, and with an abundance of the very best wood-cuts."—ROBERT SOUTHY: Letter to Henry Taylor: Southey's Life and Correspondence.

Mr. Southey remarks, on another occasion:

"I may take the opportunity of recommending the Every-Day Book and Table-Book to those who are interested in the preservation of our national and local customs: by these very curious publications their compiler has rendered good service in an important department of literature."

"These Every-Day and Table-Books will be a treasure a hundred years hence; but they have failed to make Hone's fortune. . . .

"I like you and your book, ingenious Hone,
In whose capacious, all-embracing leaves
The very marrow of tradition's shown,
And all that History—much that Fiction—weaves.

"By every sort of taste your work is graced;
Vast stores of modern anecdote we find,
With good old story quaintly interlaced:—
The theme as various as the reader's mind.

"Dan Phœbus loves your book: trust me, friend Hone;
The title only errs, he bids me say;
For, while such art, wit, reading, there are shown,
He swears, 'tis not a work of every day."

Some of the articles in the Comic Annuals were subsequently reproduced, and pub. with the additional new matter, as Hood's Own. 6. Hood's Own Complete, 1839, 8vo. New ed., 1846, 8vo. 7. Tynley Hall; a Novel, 1834, 3 vols. New ed. in 1840 and '49. Neither this novel, nor the incomplete tale entitled Our Family, added any thing to Hood's literary reputation. 8. Up the Rhine; 2d ed., 1840, cr. 8vo. This is a satire on the manners of English travellers. 9. Whimsicalities: a Periodical Gathering, 1844, fp. 8vo. This collection contains many articles originally pub. in the New Monthly Magazine.

"In this work are some of Mr. Hood's best efforts; things that will make the thoughtful wiser, and the unthinking merrier."

10. Hood's Comic Album, in Prose and Verse, 1844, 12mo. 11. The Dream of Eugene Aram. New ed., 1845, 12mo. This graphic poem—perhaps, next to the Song of the Shirt, the most popular of Hood's productions—originally appeared in the Gem for 1829. 12. Poems; 2d ed., 1846, fp. 8vo; 1851, 12mo; 5th ed., 1852, 12mo; 1854, 12mo. 13. Poems of Wit and Humour, 1847, 12mo; 3d ed., 1851, 12mo; 1854, 12mo. The Song of the Shirt, which has elicited countless imitations, and has, we trust, somewhat ameliorated the condition of a most deserving class of operatives, was the author's latest production of any importance, and originally appeared in Punch in 1844. In addition to the many literary labours just recorded, we must not forget to notice the monthly magazine established by our author, bearing his own name,—Hood's Comic Miscellany. About a year before his death, a pension of £100 per annum was granted by Government to his wife, and a subscription was raised shortly after his demise for the benefit of his widow and his two children. A collective ed. of Hood's Choice Works.—1. Prose and Verse; 2. Up the Rhine; 3. Whims and Oddities; 4. Poems; 5. Hood's Own; 6. Whimsicalities.—in 4 vols. 12mo, (also in 6 vols. 12mo) was pub. in 1852, in New York, by Messrs. George P. Putnam & Co. In 1855, Messrs. Phillips, Sampson & Co., of Boston, published a volume of more than 500 pages, containing "all of Hood's poems contained in Moxon's collections of the author's sentimental and humorous verses, with several additions from other sources. It was the most complete collection that had been made at the time of its appearance."

This collection was edited by Epes Sargent; and in 1856 the same gentleman edited, for the same house, the Humorous Poems of Thomas Hood; including Love and Lunacy, Ballads, Tales and Legends, Odes and Addresses to Great People, and Miscellaneous Poems, now first collected. This vol., of about the same size as the first, contains, besides other matter, many of Hood's contributions to the London Magazine and the New Monthly Magazine during his editorial connexion with these periodicals. An edit. of Hood's Poetical Works has also been pub. by Messrs. Little, Brown, and Co., of Boston, in 2 vols. 18mo, and several of his separate publications have been reprinted in America. On the same day that this article was prepared for the printer, (in Oct. 1856,) Messrs. Little, Brown & Co. pub. two more vols. of The Poetical Works of Thomas Hood, making in all 4 vols. of their edit. We append their advertisement:

"This is the largest collection of Hood's Poems yet offered to the public, either in England or America."

We have but small space for quotations of opinions in addition to those already cited respecting the merits of this popular author; but those who desire to read more about the serio-comic Hood shall not be disappointed. "His Dream of Eugene Aram places him high among the bards who deal in dark and fearful things and intimate rather than express deeds which men shudder to hear named. Some other of his poems have much tenderness, and a sense of nature, animate and inanimate."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: ubi supra.

"Hood's verse, whether serious or comic,—whether serene like a cloudless autumn evening, or sparkling with puns like a frosty January midnight with stars,—was ever pregnant with materials for thought. . . . Like every author distinguished for true comic humour, there was a deep vein of melancholy pathos running through his mirth; and even when his sun shone brightly, its light seemed often reflected as if only over the rim of a cloud. Well may we say, in the words of Tennyson, 'Would he could have stayed with us!' for never could it be more truly recorded of any one—in the words of Hamlet characterizing Yorick—that 'he was a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy.'"—D. M. MORRIS: ubi supra.

Hook, James, 1746–1827, a native of Norwich, organist at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, the father of Dr. James Hook and Theodore Edward Hook, was the author of more than 140 musical productions, operas, dramatic pieces, &c., and upwards of 2000 songs.

Hook, Mrs. James, formerly Miss Madden, wife of the preceding, was the author of The Double Disguise, a Musical Entertainment, Lon., 1784, 8vo.

Hook, James, LL.D., 1771–1828, eldest son of the two preceding, and brother to Theodore Edward Hook, was educated at St. Mary Hall, Oxford; became Archdeacon of Huntingdon in 1814, Dean of Worcester in 1825, and held some other preferments. 1. Jack of Newbury; an Opera, 1795. 2. Diamond Cut Diamond; a Musical Entertainment, 1797. Neither of these were printed. 3. Anguis in Herba; a true Sketch of the Ch. of Eng. and her Clergy, Lon., 1802, 8vo. See *Lon. Gent. Hook, Theodore Edward, 1788–1841, a native of London, was the son of James Hook, the musical composer, and a brother of Dr. James Hook, Dean of Worcester, both of whom have already come under our notice. Theodore was sent to Harrow to be educated, and had there for his school-fellows Sir Robert Peel and Lord Byron, with whom, however, he does not seem at that time to have formed any acquaintance. He had already commenced authorship; for before his admission to Harrow, and whilst at school in Cambridgeshire, (being then thirteen years of age,) he wrote a piece for the stage. The early evidence of talent was accompanied by indications of an extraordinary genius for music and great facility in the composition of ballads; and his father, whose profession enabled him to make a profitable use of his son's varied accomplishments, was early persuaded to let him remain at home as a junior partner in his business. In 1805, Theodore made his début as a dramatic author in the Comic Opera of The Soldier's Return, and his success was complete. This triumph was succeeded by one still more decided, if possible, in the next year, when Liston and Mathews both figured, to the unbounded delight of the public, in the boy-author's musical farce of Catch Him who Can. Young Theodore, now the favourite of the town and the darling of the Green Room, was in that dangerous position which had been foreseen by his brother, the worthy clergyman, who a short time previously had almost by force carried him to Oxford, had him entered as a student, and in vain looked for his arrival when the period had arrived for the commencement of his collegiate course. For a graphic account of this portion of Hook's life, and his subsequent experience, we must refer the reader to his autobiographical novel of Gilbert Gurney; the Rev. Mr. Barham's Life and Remains of Theodore Hook, 1849, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 5th ed., 1853, fp. 8vo; to J. G. Lockhart's article—"Theodore Hook"—in Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxii. 53–108, reprinted separately in Murray's Reading for the Rail, 3d ed., 1852, fp. 8vo; and to the authorities cited below. And now we behold Theodore fairly launched upon the great sea of London life in the various capacities of author, musician, singer, man of fashion, and inextinguishable inventor of practical jokes. Of the last, it may be sufficient to glance at that of the extempore surveyors, and the famous Berners-Street Hoax in 1859. But it was as an improvisatore that Hook shone in all his glory, and without fear of a rival. Mrs. Mathews has so graphically described his marvellous powers in this line, that we cannot do better than transcribe her account of a remarkable scene which took place on the occasion of a dinner given by the Drury Lane Company to their proprietor, the brilliant but improvident Sheridan :

"In the course of it many persons sung, and Mr. Hook, being in turn solicited, displayed, to the delight and surprise of all present, his wondrous talent in extemporaneous singing. The company was numerous, and generally strangers to Mr. Hook; but, without a moment's premeditation, he composed a verse upon every person in the room, full of the most pointed wit, and with the truest rhymes, unhesitatingly gathering into his subject, as he rapidly proceeded, in addition to what had passed during the dinner, every trivial incident of the moment. Every action was turned to account; every circumstance—the look, the gesture, or any other incidental effects—served as occasion for more wit; and even the singer's ignorance of the names and condition of many of the party seemed to give greater facility to his brilliant hits than even acquaintance with them might have furnished. Mr. Sheridan was astonished at his extraordinary facility, and declared that he could not have imagined such power possible, had he not witnessed it. No description, he said, could have convinced him of so peculiar an instance of genius; and he protested he should not have believed it to be an unstudied effort, had he not seen proof that no anticipation could have been formed of what might arise to furnish matter and opportunities for the exercise of this rare talent."—Life of Charles Mathews.

It is probable that it is to this occurrence that the author of the biography of Hook, in the Gentleman's Magazine, alludes, when he tells us

"We remember once to have heard Mr. Hook sing a song upon a company of sixty persons, each verse containing an epigram. Sheridan was present, and expressed his opinion that it was one of the most extraordinary exertions of human intellect that he had ever witnessed."

Such brilliant powers of entertainment were quite as well calculated to win the substantial favour of "the first gentleman of his age" as more solid recommendations would have been; and we need not therefore be surprised that, through the patronage of the Regent, the sparkling wit and irresistible punster was in 1812 appointed to the dignified office of Accountant-General and Treasurer to the Colony of the Mauritius, worth some £2000 per annum. Hook seems to have passed his time for five years very pleasantly in his new home, "drinking his wine and munching his fruit" during the day, and passing every evening at the balls, in which the gay society of the place indulged to their hearts' content. But a melancholy page in his history was now close at hand. In 1818 his accounts were examined, and a defalcation discovered of (as was first alleged) about £20,000, but which was subsequently (in 1823) reported by the Audit Board to be £12,000. The unhappy treasurer was suddenly dragged from supper-table to prison, and shortly afterwards sent home—on account of "something wrong in the chest," he told an inquiring friend, ignorant of the true state of affairs—to London, under charge of a military guard. We have no time nor space to linger over the details of this unpleasant episode in Hook's life; but we suppose it to be now generally agreed that his only culpability—a serious one, to-be-sure—in this unfortunate affair was his lack of attention to his official duties. If, as we are assured, "during the five years that he remained on the island, Hook never visited his office, for the purpose of business, five times," we can readily believe that his subordinates paid more regard to the large cash receipts of the office; and the suicide of one of them—who, it is true, had first called attention to the deficiency in the fund—is calculated to relieve the character of the Ex-Treasurer from the serious charge of peculation. Hook reached home, after a tedious and uncomfortable passage of nearly nine months, in January, 1819, and immediately commenced that diligent use of his pen which enabled him to produce more new volumes than there remained years in the balance of his life. Indeed, from 1824 to 1841, the year of his death, a period of about seventeen years,—for about two of which he was imprisoned under Government arrest,—he wrote 38 vols., besides editing the John Bull, a weekly newspaper, and (for part of the time) The New Monthly Magazine. Of the John Bull, commenced Dec. 16, 1820, he was one of the principal founders; and his share in the stock in the palmy days of the paper brought him in no less than £2000 per annum, in addition to a liberal salary. His income for a number of years was probably not less than £3000 per annum. But his improvidence led him into continual embarrassments, which made him the prey of the most harassing anxieties. As the conductor of the John Bull, he distinguished himself by bitter invectives against Queen Caroline and her supporters, and by an enthusiastic advocacy of High-Tory principles. He was also a contributor, in early life, to the Satirist Magazine, and subsequently to Bentley's Miscellany; and, in addition to the many works which he actually produced, promised many more, and prepared materials for A History of the House of Hanover, which was also left unfinished. Shortly after his return from the Mauritius, he attempted to establish a minor magazine, called The Arcadian; but it only survived for a short time. He was the author of one article in the Quarterly Review,—that on Prince Puckler-Muskau's English Tour, in vol. xivi.,—and probably contributed to other journals not here named. Hook was a mere butterfly of fashions, without high moral principle, and apparently without any appreciation of the duty devolving upon all to labour for the welfare and improvement of the race, and to cultivate the mind and discipline the heart for a higher sphere than that to be found in the frivolities of the ball-room or the enchantments of the stage. Hook was never married. He left six children, who, with their mother, were aided by a subscription of £3000 after their father's death. Of his remarkable literary industry for a period of almost forty years, the following list of his works affords the best illustration.

1. The Soldier's Return; a Comic Opera, 1805, 8vo. 2. Catch Him who Can; Musical Farce, 1806. 3. The Invisible Girl; Petite Piece, 1806. 4. Tekeli; Melo-Drama, 1806. 5. The Fortress; Melo-Drama, 1807. 6. Music-Mad; Dram. Sketch. 7. Siege of St. Quintin; Drama, 1807. 8. Killing no Murder; Farce, 1809. 9. Safe and Sound; Opera, 1809. 10. The Man of Sorrow, 1809, 3 vols. This, his first novel, was a failure. See Lon. Month. Rev., lix. 320-321. 11. Ass-assination; Serio-comic Entertainment, 1810. Not printed. 12. The Will, or The Widow; Dram. Trifle, 1810. Not printed. 13. Trial by Jury; Farce, 1811. 14. Darkness Visible; Farce, 1811. 15. Pigeons and Crows; Com., 1819. 16. Exchange no Robbery; Com., 1820. 17. Tentamen; or, an Essay towards the History of Whittington and his Cat, by Dr. Vicesimus Blenkinsop, 1820. This was a satire on Queen Caroline and Alderman Wood. 18. Peter and Paul; Drama, 1821. 19. Sayings and Delays. First Series, 1824, 3 vols. 20. Second Series, 1825, 3 vols. 21. Third Series, 1828, 3 vols. These 9 vols., originally pub. at £4 14s. 6d., have been reprinted in three vols. for 10s. 6d. See Blackw. Mag., xv. 334; xvii. 224. Hook's biographer in the Gent. Mag. says that Colburn agreed to pay £600 for the First Series, and voluntarily added 350 more, making £950 in all. But Mr. Lockhart says (in Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxii. 88) that Hook's diary represents his profits on the First Series at £2000. For the Second Series and Third Series Hook received from Colburn £1000 each. 22. Reminiscences of Michael Kelly, 1826, 2 vols. This was compiled by Hook from Kelly's "rough illiterate materials." It was reviewed by Sir Walter Scott in the Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxiv. 242-248. 23. Maxwell, 1830, 3 vols.; considered the best of Hook's novels. 24. The Life of Sir David Baird, 1832, 2 vols. This biography greatly pleased Lady Baird, who presented the author with a magnificent diamond snuff-box, presented by the Pacha of Egypt to Sir David. 25. The Parson's Daughter, 1833, 3 vols. 26. Jack Brag, 1837, 3 vols. 27. Births, Deaths, and Marriages, 1839, 3 vols. This work paid Hook about £600. 28. Love and Pride, 1833, 3 vols. 29. Gilbert Gurney, 1835. This autobiography—it almost deserves the name—was originally contributed—as was the sequel, which follows—to the New Monthly Magazine. 30. Gurney Married, 1839. This, and the preceding, (q. v.), were collected into 3 vols. 31. Pascal Bruno; a Sicilian Story, 1837, 1 vol. 32. Cousin Geoffrey, the Old Bachelor, 1840, 3 vols. 33. Fathers and Sons, 1841, 3 vols. Originally contributed to the New Monthly Mag. 34. Precept and Practice, 1840, 3 vols. Originally contributed to the New Monthly Mag. 35. Adventures of an Actor; or, The French Stage and French People, from the Journal of M. Fleury; 2d ed., 1842, 2 vols.: Edited by Hook. 36. Peregrine Bunce, 1842, 3 vols. Posthumous, and, as Mr. Lockhart insists, (Quar. Rev., lxxii. 53, 88), not all written by Hook. Several of his novels have been repub. from time to time, and a new ed. of Maxwell—esteemed the best of all—has been issued within the last two weeks, (September, 1856.) For further information respecting Hook and his writings, we refer the reader, in addition to the authorities cited above, to Allan Cunningham's *Biog. and Crit. "It would not be easy to find another artist with ability equal to Hook's for discussing the good and evil, the passions and affections, the fits of generosity and settled systems of saving, the self-sufficiency and the deplorable weakness, the light and darkness, the virtue and the vice, of this prodigious Babel. The stories which he tells might be invented with little outlay of fancy, for the best of them are far from being consistent; but the characters which live and breathe in them would make the narratives pleasing though they were as crooked as the walls of Troy."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: ubi supra.

"Doubtless, his wit and humour were apt to degenerate into buffoonery, his pathos into sentimentality, and his nature into conventionalism; but his knowledge of city life, in its manners, habits, and language, seemed intuitive, and has been surpassed only by Fielding and Dickens. Many and multifarious, however, as are his volumes, he has left behind him no great creation,—nothing that can be pointed to as a triumphant index of the extraordinary powers which he undoubtedly possessed."—D. M. MOON: ubi supra.

"TICKLER.—Confound haste and hurry! What else can account for Theodore Hook's position! Who that has read his sayings and Doings, and, above all, his Maxwell, can doubt that, had he given himself time for consideration and correction, we should have been reading him ere now, nem. con., as another Smollett, if not another Le Sage!"

"WORTH.—I agree with you; and I sincerely hope this novel-improver will pause ere it is too late, and attempt something really worthy of his imagination. But, as it is, such is the richness of the vis comica showered over these careless extravaganzas, that, unless he himself throws them into the shade by subsequent performances, I venture to say they have a better chance of being remembered a hundred years hence than any contemporary productions of their class—except only those of the two great lights of Scotland and Ireland—Jam dudum ad scripta Camoenæ."—JOHN WILSON: Notæ Ambrosianæ, Sept. 1831.

"His name will be preserved. His political songs and jeu-d'esprit, when the hour comes for collecting them, will form a volume of sterling and lasting attraction; and after many clever romances of this age shall have sufficiently occupied public attention, and sunk, like hundreds of former generations, into utter oblivion, there are tales in his collection which will be read with, we venture to think, even a greater interest than they commanded in their novelty. . . . We have already expressed our opinion, however, that Theodore Hook's ability in conversation was above what he ever exemplified in his writings. We have seen him in company with very many of the most eminent men of his time; and we never, until he was near his end, carried home the impression with us that he had been surpassed."—J. G. LOCKHART: ubi supra.

Hook, Walter Farquhar, D.D., Vicar of Leeds, Preb. of Lincoln, and Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the Queen, is a son of Dr. James Hook, Dean of Worcester, and a nephew of Theodore Edward Hook, both of whom have already come under our notice. Dr. Hook is noted for his untiring energy in the cause of church extension, and is the author of many theological publications, of which the Church Dictionary, (7th ed., 1854, 8vo.) Ecclesiastical Biography, (vols. i–viii., 1845–52, 12mo.) Hear the Church, (28th ed., 1838, 8vo.) a Call to Union, (4th ed., 1839, 8vo.) and the Serms. on the Miracles, (1847–48, 2 vols. 8vo.) on various subjects, (2d ed., 1844, 8vo.) and those delivered before the Univ. of Oxford, (3d ed., 1847, 12mo.) are among the best-known. Hooke, Nathaniel, d. 1763, a R. Catholic, of whose life few particulars are known, will always be remembered for his excellent Roman History, and as the friend of Alexander Pope, who brought the priest to his death-bed, to Bolingbroke's great disgust. 1. 1773; ii. 1745; iii. 1764; iv. 1771. Vols. i., ii., and iii. have been frequently reprinted in 4to; 1766, 9 vols. 8vo; 1806, 11 vols. 8vo; 1818, 11 vols. 8vo; 1830, 6 vols. 8vo. This work should be read as an introduction to Gibbon's History, which carries on the narrative.

"The Roman History of this judicious and masterly writer is a most valuable accession to the stock of historical learning. The execution is equal throughout. Mr. Hooke seems to have possessed in a very eminent degree the rare talent of separating the partisan from the historian, of which few writers are capable, and of comparing contradictory authorities with impartiality and penetration. He does not appear to have been a bigot to any principles or a slave to any authority."—Lon. Month. Rev.

"This occupies the whole ground that Livy had chosen. He was a laborious and faithful compiler. The Jesuits Catron and Rouillé far exceeded him, for they compiled a Roman History in 21 vols. 4to, which is the most extensive Roman History extant."—CHANCELLOR KENT.

"It is more thorough than Ferguson's history, and far more faithful than that of Echard. Goldsmith's Rome is only a pleasant abridgment of it, while Arnold's learned and valuable work closes with the Punic wars."—Lawrence's Lives of the British Historians, 1856.

For this work the duchess rewarded the author with £5000, but soon quarrelled with him, on account, as she alleged, of his efforts to convert her to the Church of Rome. Hooke also pub. some works on the Roman Senate, on which subject he had a controversy with Dr. Conyers Middleton. See Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Ruffhead's Life of Pope; Chesterfield's Memoirs; Boswell's Life of Johnson; Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors.

"Hooke was a virtuous man, as his history shows."—Dr. Johnson: ubi supra.

Hooke, Robert, M.D., 1635–1702, an eminent experimental philosopher, a native of Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight, and son of the rector of that place, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford; elected in January, 1665, Curator of Experiments for the Royal Society for life; and in March of the same year succeeded Dr. Daeres as Professor of Geometry in Gresham College. Hooke was unquestionably one of the most ingenious philosophers whom the world has ever seen, and perhaps no one man ever made so many discoveries,—amounting, with the contrivances for illustrating them, to some hundreds. Among those which he claimed—for with respect to some the priority of discovery is a matter of dispute—are: 1656. Barometer or Weather-Glass; 1657. A scapement for maintaining the vibration of a pendulum; and subsequently the regulating or balance-spring for watches; 1658. The Double-barrelled air-pump and the conical pendulum; 1660. The engine for cutting clock and watch-wheels; the chief phenomena of capillary attraction; the freezing of water a fixed temperature; 1663. The method of supplying air to a diving-bell; the number of vibrations made by a musical chord; 1665. In this year his Micrographia was pub., in which will be found notices of many of his discoveries on respiration, the composition of the atmosphere, and the nature of light; 1666. A quadrant by reflection; 1667. The marine barometer, and the gauge for sounding unfathomable depths; 1674. Steam-engine on Newcomen's principle; 1679. That the air was the sole source of heat in burning, &c.; 1684. The application of the principle of the Telegraph. See Encyc. Brit.; Life, by Waller; Biog. Brit.; Wood's Gresham Professors; Athen. Oxon.; Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe; Bouvier's Familiar Astronomy. In 1686, on the publication of Newton's Principia, Hooke (who had in 1671 attacked Newton's New Theory of Light and Colours) claimed the prior discovery of the principle of gravitation, or, rather, the application of that principle. But Newton's letters to Halley settle the matter in favour of the writer. Yet great credit is undoubtedly due to Hooke. To borrow the language of Professor Playfair, when commenting on "the length to which Galileo advanced in this direction, and the point at which he stopped,"

"Hooke did not stop short in the same unaccountable manner, but made a nearer approach to the truth than any one had yet done."—Third Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

In the words of a learned lady of our day,

"The idea expressed by Kepler, of the ebb and flow of the ocean being caused by the attractive influence of the moon, received in 1666 and 1674 a fresh impulse and a more extended application through the sagacity of the ingenious Robert Hooke, a noted experimental philosopher, who distinguished himself by numerous discoveries in science."—Hannah M. Bouvier's Familiar Astronomy, Phila., 1857, 346.

The following is a list of the works of this distinguished philosopher. 1. An Attempt to Explain the Phenomena of an Experiment of Robert Boyle, Lon., 1661, 8vo. 2.

Micrographia, Lon., 1665, 71, fol.; Abridgt., 1780, fol.; Micrographia Restituta, 1745, fol. 3. Animadversions on the first part of Hevelius his machina celestis, 1674, 4to. 4. Essays on Physical Subjects, 1674-82, 4to. 5. Attempt to prove the Motion of the Earth from Observations, 1674, 4to. 6. Descrip. of Helioscopes and other Instruments made by himself, 1676, 4to. 7. Lampas, 1677, 4to.

"Dr. Hooke, . . . who had a particular predilection for hypothesis, sketched in his Micrographia a very beautiful theoretical explanation of combustion, and promised to develop his doctrine more fully in a subsequent book; a promise which he never fulfilled, though in his Lampas, published about twenty (twelve) years afterwards, he has given a very beautiful explanation of the way in which a candle burns."—*Hallam's Lit. "He always expressed veneration for the Deity, as may be seen in a great many passages of his writings; and seldom received any remarkable benefit from God, without thankfully acknowledging the mercy; he never made any considerable discovery in nature, invented any useful contrivance, or found out any difficult problem, without setting down his acknowledgment to God, as many places in his diary testified. And he frequently studied the sacred writings in the originals."—Lafc. by Waller: ubi supra.

"The style of Dr. Hooker abounds in spontaneous interest and unexpected graces. It seems to result immediately from his character, and to be an inseparable part of it. . . . We meet at times in Dr. Hooker's writings with phrases of the rarest felicity, and of great delicacy and expressiveness; in which we know not whether most to admire the vigour which has conceived so striking a thought, or the refinement of art which has fixed it in words so beautifully exact."—Grinnold's Prose Writers of America.

Hooker, or Vowell, John, M.P., 1524?-1601, a native of Exeter, and member of Parliament for that city, the uncle of the "Judicious Hooker," has already come under our notice as the coadjutor of Raphael Holinshed in the compilation of his Chronicles. Hooker also wrote The Order and Vage of Keeping of the Parlements in England, 1572? 4to; The Events of Comets, Lon., 1577, 8vo; Cat. of the Bishops of Excester, 1584; Offices, etc. of Everie Officer of Excester, 1584, 4to; and The Antiques Descrip. and Account of Exeter, Exon., 1765, sm. 4to. Hooker, Richard, 1653?-1600, was a native of Heavytree, near Exeter. His good conduct and quickness in learning whilst at the grammar-school of Exeter made him a great favourite with his tutor, at whose instance young Richard's uncle presented his nephew to Bishop Jewel, and besought him, for

"Charity's sake, to look favourably upon a poor nephew of his, whom nature had fitted for a scholar, but the estate of his parents was so narrow that they were unable to give him the advantage of learning."

He therefore expressed the hope that the bishop would "Become his patron, and prevent him from being a tradesman, for he was a boy of remarkable hopes."

The good bishop sent him to Oxford and placed him under charge of Dr. John Cole, President of Corpus Christi College, who appointed him a tutor and Bible-clerk of the college. He now enjoyed the advantage of the instructions of Dr. John Reynolds for four years. In 1577 he was chosen Fellow of his college. In 1579 he received the appointment of deputy-professor of Hebrew. In 1581 he was ordained; and, according to the college-statutes, he was immediately appointed to preach a sermon at St. Paul's Cross, London. He lodged at a dwelling appropriated to the preachers, which was called the Shunamis house. Much indisposed by the fatigue of his journey to the city, he was so grateful for the kind attentions of Mrs. Churchman, who had charge of this "house of the prophets," that his complaisance got the better of his judgment. Walton tells the story so quaintly that, even at the risk of being charged with countenancing a slander against "provident" mothers, we must quote it:

"He thought himself bound in conscience to believe all that she said: so that the good man came to be persuaded by her. 'That he was a man of a tender constitution; and that it was best for him to have a wife that might prove a nurse to him; such an one as might both prolong his life and make it more comfortable; and such an one as could and would provide for him if he thought fit to marry.' And he, not considering that the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light, but, like a true Nathaniel, fearing no guile, because he meant none, did give her such a power as Eleazar was trusted with (you may read it in the book of Genesis) when he was sent to choose a wife for Isaac; for even so he trusted her to choose for him; promising upon a fair summons to return to London and accept of her choice. And he did so, in that or about the year following. Now, the wife provided for him was her daughter Joan, who brought him neither beauty nor portion: and for her conditions, they were too like that wife's which is by Solomon compared to a dripping house."

"Which A. Wood explains, by saying, that she was a silly, downish woman, and withal a meer Xanthippe."

What a proof of the kindness of heart of good Mrs. Churchman, to intrust the happiness of her daughter to the young divine! So anxious was she to promote his comfort and prolong what promised to be a valuable life, that she was willing to submit to the sacrifice, and deprive herself of the society of her dear Joan! But will it be believed that the magnanimity of this excellent woman has been questioned, and that she has even been blamed as a "managing mother," for thus converting Miss Jean Churchman into Mrs. Richard Hooker? So uncharitable is human nature! And, from some modern instances which occasionally occur of like conduct of mothers whose distrustfulness is not apprehended, it would seem that detection was not confined to the days of Mrs. Churchman. If his wife did not prove, as his mother-in-law promised she should, a "comfort" to him, we have evidence that he bore his troubles with laudable equanimity. Two of his former pupils, Mr. Edwin Sandys and Mr. George Cranmer, paid him a visit at his parsonage at Dryton-Boscamp, in Buckinghamshire, of which he became Rector in 1564, and we are told that "They found him with a book in his hand, it was the Office of Heaven, he being then, like humble and innocent Ash, tending his small flock of sheep in a common field which he told these gentlemen he was bound to do then, for that his curate was gone home to dine and assist his wife to do some necessary household business. But when his curate returned and rejoined him, his two pupils attended him into his house, where their host entertained them in his quiet company, which was presently dissolved when Mr. Richard was asked to read the credo, and the rest of their volume was on the table, that they could not all read morning, which was then enough to discomfit and pity their tutor's condition. They were bound to leave him to the company of his wife and Jean, and took themselves a quiet lodging for the next night. But of their parting from him, Mr. Cranmer said, 'Good Father, I am every year led to him in no better ground as to your parsonage, and more every year with grows not a more comfortable companion, after you have wasted your thoughts in your rustic studies.' To whom the good man replied, 'My dear George, if saints have usually a double share in the miseries of this life, I, that am none, ought not to rejoice at what my wife Cranmer hath appointed her me, but labour (as indeed I do daily) to submit to his will, and promote my soul to patience and peace.'—Walter's Life of Hooker.

Here was a model husband indeed.

To this visit of his former pupils are we indebted for that immortal production, The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. Edwin Sandys urged his father, then Bishop of London, to find a more comfortable post for his quondam tutor. This led to his appointment, in 1564, after the death of "Father Alvy," of Master of the Temple for life, being then in his 33d or 34th year. Hooker was the morning lecturer, and Mr. Travers held forth in the afternoon. The latter gentleman followed the views of Cartwright, the Puritan, and inclined to the Presbyterian side in discipline. This contrariety of sentiment led to an amiable controversy between the lecturers, who seem to have entertained for each other all due respect. Thus, it was observed, "the forenoon sermon spoke Canterbury, and the afternoon Geneva." Archbishop Whitgift prohibited the lectures of Mr. Travers. Travers appealed to the queen, but in vain; he then published his memorial, which was answered by Hooker. This answer may be considered the germ of his great work, Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. He commenced his work in the Temple, but, finding less distraction requisite, he solicited the archbishop to permit him to retire to some more quiet post. Accordingly, that prelate presented him, in 1591, to the rectory of Bishopscote, in Wiltshire, and to the prebend of Nether-Haven in the Cathedral of Salisbury, of which he was also made sub-dean. Four books of his work were finished at Bishopscote, and printed in 1593, fol., again, 1594, fol. In 1595 Queen Elizabeth presented him to the rectory of Bishopscote, in Kent, where he lived the rest of his days. Whilst sailing between London and Gravesend, he caught a cold which carried him off at the early age of forty-seven. He died the death of the righteous, and to his triumphant soul "the doors of Heaven seemed to open so wide" that he was enabled to catch a view of that ineffable glory which surrounds the throne of "the High and Lofly One who inhabiteth Eternity." Happy are they who have the good report of the members of their own household and of their intimate associates; for they have the best opportunity of knowing our faults and detesting all of our infirmities. Our excellent author does not lack this weighty attestation:

"My master, Hooker, was a good man and a good scholar."

So testifies his parish clerk.

The 8th Book of Ecclesiastical Polity was published in 1597, fol., 1632, fol., the 7th in 1617, (according to Biog. Brit.), and the 6th and 8th (the conclusion) in 1648, 4to. The eight books, with a few sermons and tracts, published separately in 1612-13, and a Life of Hooker, were pub. in Dr. Gandon's edition of his works, Lon., 1643, fol.; 3d ed., 1646, fol., with Life, by Walton. It is contended, indeed, that "all the eight books, with certain tracts and sermons, together with the author's life, were published in two vols. in fol., 1617." See Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon.,

In the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, Hooker presents an elaborate, dignified, and learned defence of the ministry, ritual, and ceremonies of the Church of England. Its polemical arguments have satisfied many. Its literary merits have charmed all. Its fame having reached Rome, Cardinal Allen and Dr. Stapleton recommended it so strongly to Clement VIII., that he wished to have it translated into Latin, in which language Stapleton read to him the 1st book, declaring that "There is no learning that this man hath not searched into; nothing too hard for his understanding. This man indeed deserves the name of an author. His books will get reverence by age, for there is to them such smell of eternity, that, if the poet be like this, they shall continue till the last fire shall devour all learning."

James I. remarked to Archbishop Whitgift:

"I have omitted some attention to reading a leaf or paragraph in Mr. Hooker, though I was not about the duties of churchmen, or church men, or the like, but especially of the sacraments, thus I have had in reading large tracts written but of one of them subjects by others, though very learned men."

Charles I. commended the five books then extant of the Polity to his dear children as an excellent means to cultivate private devotion, and settle the public peace of the Church and Kingdom.

Our learned author seems to have a right by long use to the title of "The Jaded Hooker."

"The extraordinary and imperishable work of Hooker to his Ecclesiastical Polity Bishop Leach, in the preface to his English Grammar, has bestowed the highest praise upon the purity of Hooker's style. Bishop Warburton, in his book on the Alliance between the Church and State, often quotes him, and calls him 'the excellent, the admirable, the best great man of our order.'"
—Dr. Parr.

"Of the Ecclesiastical Hooker—whose memory is embalmed in the beautiful biography of him by Isaac Walton—it is sufficient to say, that his Ecclesiastical Polity is, of all works of that description, one of the most masterly and convincing. Never was logic more successfully employed to combat error and establish truth; and the vein of majestic prose, as well as of spiritual comfort, which pervades the pages of that work, will render it, to the latest posterity, a popular as well as instructive performance."—Dr. Hunter's Lib. Comp., ed. 1838, '46, '54.

The following is no small eulogy:

"Should the English constitution in Church and State be unhappily ruined by some convulsion of extraordinary time, this book alone probably contains materials sufficient for regaining and reestablishing the shattered fabric."

"He was an able champion for the constitutional hierarchy. His against Bridges, Morrice against Cosins, and Besa against Saravia, although the press was shut against them by law, and their books could only be published by stealth."—BOGUS.

"The Ecclesiastical Polity of Hooker, who was superior to the pedantry of the times, is worthy of the present age for its liberal and manly sentiment."—Comparisons of the Lit. of the Present Age with that of the Reigns of Eliza. and Anne, by Rev. E. P. BISHOP. See Goodhugh's Lib. Man., 166.

"His works manifest great vigour of thought, eloquence of expression, soundness of judgment, and decidedly evangelical sentiment: his Ecclesiastical Polity is one of the bulwarks of the Established Church of England."—BUCKEY: Christian Student.

"For a defence of the Church of England against the Sectaries, it will suffice, inстар omnium, to study Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, a work bearing all the marks of immortality, as destined to excite the admiration of men while good letters remain amongst them."—Bishop Warburton's Directions to his Student.

"The Ecclesiastical Polity is the principal work of this able and venerable man, and perhaps the best defence of the Church of England ever published. Those who dissent from his doctrine of church order may, nevertheless, read this remarkable production with great advantage, because of the dignity and force of the language in which it is written, the author's meekness in controversy, and the very just and impressive views of revealed truth which he has often introduced."—Dr. E. Williams's Christian Preacher.

"Amplly as Hooker enriched his native tongue, he frequently presents the cumbrous gait and the rough aspect of a pioneer. Taylor surpasses him in all the charms of imagination; Hall, in the sweetness and colour of his thoughts; Barrow, in the illumination of his argument. But Hooker excelled them all in muscular vigour. . . . We turn to his works, as to some mighty bulwark against infidelity, impregnable to the assaults of successive generations."—WILLMORS.

For other comparisons of Hooker to Taylor, Barrow, &c., see BARROW, ISAAC, D.D.; TAYLOR, JEREMY, D.D. Referring to Hooker's theological sentiments, Mr. Macaulay remarks:

"The school of divinity of which Hooker was the chief occupies a middle place between the school of Crammer and the school of Laud; and Hooker has in modern times been claimed by the Arminians as an ally."—History of England, vol. i., 1849.

Dr. Drake remarks of Hooker's composition:

"Though the words, for the most part, are well chosen and pure, the arrangement of them into sentences is intricate and harsh, and formed almost exclusively on the idiom and construction of the Latin. Much strength and vigour are derived from this adoption, but periphrasy, sweetness, and ease, are too generally sacrificed. There is, notwithstanding these usual features of his composition, an occasional simplicity in his pages, both of style and sentiment, which truly charms."—Essays Illustrative of the Tudor, &c., vol. i. 10.

Mr. Beloe complains that "Neither Walton in his Life of Hooker, nor Bishop Gauden, nor many others that give an account of Hooker and his writings, make mention of the particular books or tracts which gave occasion to his writing the Ecclesiastical Polity."

Mr. Beloe proceeds to supply this omission in Anecdotes of Literature and Scarce Books, vol. i. p. 21.

Mr. Hallam's authority is, in all cases, one of the most weighty which can be adduced:

"The finest as well as the most philosophical writer of the Elizabethan period is Hooker. The first book of the Ecclesiastical Polity is at this day one of the master-pieces of English eloquence. His periods, indeed, are generally much too long and too intricate, but portions of them are often beautifully rhythmical; his language is rich in English idiom without vulgarity, and in words of a Latin source without pedantry; he is more uniformly solemn than the usage of later times permits, or even than writers of that time, such as Bacon, conversant with mankind as well as books, would have reckoned necessary; but the example of ancient orators and philosophers, upon themes so grave as those which he discusses, may justify the serious dignity from which he does not depart. Hooker is perhaps the first of such in England who adorned his prose with the images of poetry; but this he has done more judiciously and with more moderation than others of great name; and we must be bigots in Attic severity, before we can object to some of his grand figures of speech. We may praise him also for avoiding the superfluous luxury of quotations;—a rock on which the writers of the succeeding age were so frequently wrecked."—Introduc. to Lit. of Europe; ed. 1854, vol. ii. 198.

"The Ecclesiastical Polity of Hooker is a monument of real learning, in prose as well as theological antiquity."—Ibid., vol. i. 518.

After such a cloud of witnesses to the merits of this eminent writer, we trust that it is unnecessary for us to urge our readers—young and old—to devote at least a portion of their days and nights to the pages of Hooker. And, that they may be persuaded so to do, we shall gratify them with a few more eloquent lines of glowing eulogy from the same distinguished scholar who has opened the paths of learning to so many of the past and present generation, and who still remains—now on the verge of fourscore years—to see the abundant fruits of his labours, and receive the grateful benedictions of many whom he has guided to intellectual elevation and stimulated to the acquisition of mental riches of priceless worth. Of the author of the Ecclesiastical Polity, Mr. Hallam does not scruple to declare:

"He not only opened the mine, but explored the depths, of our native eloquence. So stately and graceful is the march of his periods, so various the fall of his musical cadences upon the ear, so rich in images, so condensed in sentences, so grave and noble his diction, so little is there of vulgarity in his racy idiom, of pedantry in his learned phrase, that I know not whether any later writer has more admirably displayed the capacities of our language, or produced passages more worthy of comparison with the splendid monuments of antiquity. If we compare the first book of the Ecclesiastical Polity with what bears perhaps most resemblance to it of any thing extant, the treatise of Cicero de Legibus, it will appear somewhat perhaps inferior, through the imperfection of our language,—which, with all its force and dignity, does not equal the Latin in either of those qualities,—and certainly more tedious and diffuse in some of its reasonings; but by no means less high-toned in sentiment or less bright in fancy, and far more comprehensive and profound in the foundations of its philosophy."—Constit. Hist. of Eng., ed. 1854, i. 215.

Hooker, Richard. Weekly Miscellany, 1736–38, 2 vols. 8vo.

Hooker, Thomas, 1586–1647, "The Renowned Pastor of Hartford Church, and Pillar of Connecticut Colony," a native of Marfield, Leicestershire, educated at and Fellow of Emanuel College, Cambridge, took holy orders and preached for some time in London. In 1626 he became assistant to a clergyman at Chelmsford, and officiated with great reputation until silenced for Non-conformity by Laud, then Bishop of London. He subsequently went to Holland, where he preached for two or three years at Delft, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam, and in 1633 emigrated to Boston, New England, in company with John Cotton and Samuel Stone. In October of the same year he assumed the charge of the congregation at New-Town, now Cambridge, Mass. Mr. Stone acting as his assistant. In June, 1636, in company with Mr. Stone and about one hundred other persons, he removed to "a fertile spot on the banks of the Connecticut," which they called Hartford,—the name by which it is still known,—in honour of Mr. Stone, who was a native of Hartford, in England. In his new location, Hooker was distinguished by the same unquenchable zeal, untiring energy, and fiery eloquence, which were his characteristics from early youth, and no name had more influence in the churches of New England. He was carried off by an epidemical fever, July 7, 1647, aged 61. John Higginson transcribed from his MSS. about 200 sermons, and sent them to England, and about half of them were pub. A number of his theological treatises were pub. before his death, and some were posthumous. Among the best-known of his works are—A Survey of the Sum of Church Discipline, The Soul's Implantation, The Application of Redemption, and the Poor Doubting Christian drawn to Christ.

Pub. under the supervision of Dr. Thomas Goodwin, of London, and highly commended by him. See his Address prefixed. 15. The Covenant of Grace Opened; in several Serms., 1649, 4to. 16. The Saint's Dignity and Duty; in several Serms., 1651. 17. The Spiritual Rule of the Lord's Kingdom. 18. The Application of Redemption, 1656; 2d ed., 1659.

The death of the excellent Hooker was lamented as a public loss, and his virtues were celebrated—if not in as many languages as those which chanted the praises of Louis le Grand—in majestic Latin and pathetic Saxon. John Cotton, Elijah Corlet, Ezekiel Rogers, Peter Bulkeley, and Edward Johnson, were among those who vied in epi-cedonian strains over the lamented dead. The first-named honoured his departed friend both in prose and verse;—in the former telling us that Hooker "Agmen ducere et dominari in Concionibus, gratia Spiritus Sancti et virtute plenius;" and that he was "Vir Solertis et Acerrimi iudicii;" and in the latter expressing himself in the following rather homely stanzas:

"Twas of Geneva's heroes said with wonder,
(Those worthies three), Farel was wont to thunder,
Viret like rain on tender grass to show'r,
But Calvin lively oracles to pour.
All these in Hooker's spirit did remain,
A son of thunder and a show'r of rain;
A power-orth of lively oracles,
In saving souls, the sum of miracles."

"Tis that Hooker, of whom I may venture to say that the famous Romanist who wrote a book, De Tribus Thomas; or, Of Three Thomas's,—meaning Thomas the Apostle, Thomas Becket, and Sir Thomas More,—did not a thousandth part so well sort his Thomas's, as a New Englander might if he should write a book, De Duobus Thomas; or, Of Two Thomas's, and with Thomas the Apostle join our celebrated Thomas Hooker: my one Thomas, even our apostolical Hooker, would in just balance weigh down two of Stapleton's rebellious Archbishops or bigoted Lord-Chancellors. 'Tis he whom I may call, as Theodoret called Irenaeus, 'The light of the Western Churches.'—MATHER: Magnalia, ed. 1855, l. 333: The Life of Mr. Thomas Hooker.

Hoole, John, 1727-1803, a native of Moorfields, London, was for nearly 40 years—1744-83—a clerk in the East India House. 1. Trans. of Dante's Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, Lon., 1763, 2 vols. 8vo. We have already noticed this translation in our life of FAIRFAX, EDWARD, q.v.

"Among the valuable acquisitions I made about this time [of leaving the High School] was an acquaintance with Tasso's Jerusalem, through the fat medium of Mr. Hoole's translation."—Sir Walter Scott's Autobiography.

"The reader will observe in the foregoing specimens of Hoole how a bad translator takes refuge from the real feelings of his author in vagueness and cant phrases. . . . When Mr. Hoole takes leave of his author, it is for want of strength to accompany him; when Fairfax does it, it is to lead you into some beautiful corner of his fancy."—LEMON HUNT: Critique on Fairfax's Tasso.

"That vile version of Hoole's. . . The flat couplets of a rhymester like Hoole."—BOSSWELL'S LIFE AND CORRESP.

Mr. Roscoe says of Ariosto, "In the Orlando we admire the poet, but in the Satures we love the man!" 6. Cleonice; a Tragedy. 7. Trans. of Tasso's Rinaldo; a Poem, 1792, 8vo. 8. Critical Essays of John Scott, of Amwell; with his Life, by J. Hoole, 1785, 8vo. Dr. Johnson—with whom our author was intimate—valued Hoole's abilities much more highly than they deserved: see FAIRFAX, EDWARD. Modern critics, as we have seen, have deducted largely from the estimate of the great lexicographer:

"Mr. Hoole, the translator of Tasso and Ariosto, and in that capacity a noble transmitter of gold into lead. . . He did exactly so many couplets day by day, neither more nor less; and habit had made it light to him, however heavy it might seem to the reader."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Diary, June 4, 1836.

"Ben Jonson was a great man, Hoole a very small man. But Hoole, coming after Pope, had learned how to manufacture decasyllable verses, and poured them forth by thousands and tens of thousands, all as well-timed, as smooth, and as like each other, as the blocks which have passed through Mr. Brunel's mill in the dock-yard at Portsmouth. Ben's heroic couplets resemble blocks rudely hewn out by an unpractised hand with a blunt hatchet. Take as a specimen his translation of a celebrated passage in the Æneid:

"This child our parent earth, stirred up with spite. . . Compare with these jagged misshapen distiches the neat fabric which Hoole's machine produces in unlimited abundance. We take the first lines on which we open in his version of Tasso. They are neither better nor worse than the rest."—T. B. MACAULAY: *Edin. Hooper, Edward James, b. 1803, in England, settled in the United States in 1830, is the author of a Dictionary of Agriculture, Cincin., 1842, edited for several years the Western Farmer and Gardener, and has been for upwards of twenty years a constant contributor to agricultural journals.

Hooper, George, D.D., 1640-1727, a native of Grimley, Worcestershire, was educated at St. Paul's and Westminster schools, elected to Christ Church College, Oxford, 1657; Rector of Lambeth, 1675; Dean of Canterbury, 1691; Bishop of St. Asaph's, 1703; trans. to Bath and Wells, 1704. He pub. a work on Ancient Measures, Lon., 1721, 8vo, anon.; and a number of serms. and theolog. treatises, 1681-1713. A collective ed. of his works was pub. at Oxford, 1757, fol., by Dr. Hunt, the Professor of Hebrew.

Hooper, John, the Reformer and Martyr, 1495-1554, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Merton College, Oxford, was for some time one of the Cistercians, or White Monks, but subsequently embraced the principles of the Reformation. In 1539 he fled to Zurich, and remained abroad until the accession of Edward VI. In 1550 he was consecrated Bishop of Gloucester, and about two years later he had the bishopric of Worcester given to him, in commendam. On the accession of Mary, July, 1553, he was a prominent mark for the persecutors; and, refusing to recant, he was burnt in the city of Gloucester, near his own cathedral, on the 9th of the February ensuing. He was the author of many theological treatises, expositions, and serms., for an account of which, see Fox's Martyrs; Burnett's Hist. of the Reformation; Strype's Cranmer; Fathers of the English Church, vol. v.; British Reformers, vol. iv.; Tracts of Ang. Fathers, vol. ii.; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Wordsworth's Eccles. Biog. The reader must procure the following collections of the writings of this excellent man:

Early Writings, edited, with Biographical Notice, Index, &c., by S. Carr, Camb., (Univ. Press.) 1843, 8vo. Contents:—A Declaration of Christ and his Office; Answer to Bishop Gardiner; a Declaration of the X. Commandments; Sermons upon the Prophet Jonas; and Funeral Sermon on Rev. xiv. 13.

Later Writings, together with his Letters and other Pieces, edited, with Biographical Notice, Index, &c., by C. Nevinson, Camb., (Univ. Press.) 1852, 8vo. Contents:—A Lesson of the Incarnation of Christ; Confession of Faith; Annotations on Romans xiii.; Copy of Visitation Book; Expositions of Psalms xxiii., lxiii., lxxiii., and lxxvii.; Treatise respecting Judge Hales; Epistola ad Episcopos, &c.; Appellatio ad Parlamentum; Hyperapismus de vera Doctrina et Usa Censæ Demini, &c.

Hooper, Lucy, 1816-1841, a native of Newburyport, Massachusetts, removed in her 15th year to Brooklyn, Long Island, where she resided until her death. In early life she contributed many poetical essays to the Long Island Star, and the New Yorker, a daily paper; and in 1840 pub. a vol. of prose sketches, entitled Scenes from Real Life. She also gave to the world at the same time An Essay on Domestic Happiness. During her last illness she was preparing for publication a work entitled The Poetry of Flowers, which appeared shortly after her decease. In 1843 Mr. John Keese edited a collection of her Literary Remains, prefaced by a Memoir; and an enlarged edit. of her Poetical Works was pub. in 1848. Specimens of the poetry of this accomplished lady are given in Griswold's Female Poets of America, where the reader will find eloquent tributes to the memory of Miss Hooper from John G. Whittier, Henry T. Tuckerman, and Dr. John W. Francis. See also Democratic Review, xi. 90.

Notice of the 4th edit.:

"The publisher has judged wisely in producing this new edition in a form more convenient and less expensive than any of its predecessors. The value of the book is increased by the addition of some notes and cases left in MS. by the author, and devoted by him to be inserted in this edition. For our knowledge of diseases of the heart, we are in no small degree indebted to the various inquiries and pursuits of the learned author."—Lon. Lancet.

Hope, John, M.D., 1725–1786, educated at the Univ. of Edinburgh, and at Paris, was in 1761 appointed King's Botanist in Scotland, Superintendent of the Royal Garden, and Professor of Botany and Materia Medica, and in 1766 was nominated Regius Professor of Botany in the Univ. of Edinburgh. He pub. a Dissert. in Phil. Trans., 1769, on the Rheum Palmatum, and another in Phil. Trans., 1768, on the Ferula Ammifolia. At the time of his death he left established an extensive work on botany, which had long engaged his anxious interest. See his Life, by D. DUNCAN, Medical Commentaries, Dec. II., vol. III. The shrub Hesperis was so named by Linnaeus in compliment to Dr. Hope.

Hope, Thomas, d. 1831, of the same family as Sir Thomas Hope, (ante), was one of the three brothers of this name well known as wealthy merchants of Amsterdam. The subject of our notice devoted a considerable time, whilst still quite young, to extensive peregrinations in various parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and, after retiring from business, purchased two spacious mansions, one in Duchess Street, London, and the other ("Doopdene") in the vicinity of Dorking. True permanently settled in England, Mr. Hope soon rendered his residence famous as choice galleries of the finest specimens of art. The reader will find an account of Mr. Hope's town-mansion in Britton and Pugin's Public Buildings of London, and in Westmacott's Account of the British Galleries of Painting and Sculpture. For a description of "Doopdene," see Aubrey's Pereambulation of the County of Surrey; Noble's Seats of Noblemen and Gentlemen; and Pomeroy's Views in Surrey. The owner of all this magnificence died February 3, 1831, leaving a personal property of £100,000. To give some idea of the vast wealth of members of this family, we may state that Henry Philip Hope, a brother of the subject of this notice, left at his death, in 1840, a collection of diamonds and other precious stones valued at £150,000, and an income of £50,000 to each of his three nephews. A younger member of this family has within the last few years built a church and a missionary-institution in London at a cost of about £70,000.

Mr. Hope's love of the fine arts, classical enthusiasm, and exquisite perception of the beautiful in art, as well as in the appliances of luxury, were developed in several publications, which have deservedly given him a high rank as an author. 1. A Letter addressed to F. Annesley, Esq., on a Series of Designs for Downing College, Cambridgeshire. See Lon. Gent. Mag., 1831. 2. Household Furniture and Interior Decorations; executed from Designs by the Author, Lon., 1807, r. fol., 25 6s. Large paper, atlas fol., $10 10s. Pp. 173. This work was unmercifully handled by Lord Jeffrey in the Edin. Rev., x. 478–486.

"If the cultivation of Europe depended on Mr. Hope's disquisitions, he could not have exerted it with more earnestness and estimation, and we are convinced that neither the rectitude of learning nor the reformers of religion ever spoke of their subject in terms half so magnificent, nor of their own abilities with such studied and graceful modesty, as this ingenious person has here done in recommending to his countrymen a better form for their lamps, chandeliers, and credenz."—Lon. JOURNAL; vide supra; and see Lon. Month. Rev., i. 176–181.

But, notwithstanding the drud reviewer's wit, this work led the way to a complete revolution in the upholstery and interior decoration of houses:

"To Mr. Hope we are indebted in an eminent degree for the classical and appropriate style which now generally characterizes our furniture and domestic utensils."—Edin.'s Union of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture.

minute accuracy in the accounts of Eastern classes and Oriental manners. The author is, however, justly to be blamed for the licentious tone so often obtruded on his readers. As the work appeared anonymously, the authorship was for some time a matter of doubt. A writer in Blackwood (x. 200-206, in Familiar Epistles to Christopher North, Letter 11) ridiculed the idea of Hope's producing such a work:

"Mr. Hope is a very respectable and decorous gentleman,—he can write, with some endeavour, passably about chests of drawers, paper-hangings, and cushions as soft as his own or any other brains; but that he has either the courage or the power to compile such a work as Anastasis, I utterly and entirely deny. . . . I would call your attention to a few circumstances that, I conceive you will allow, constitute strong proofs that Anastasis is the production of Byron."

This Epistle elicited a letter from Hope, in the next number of the Magazine, (x. 312,) in which he claimed the sole authorship of ANASTASIS. See also Blackwood's Mag., xv. 51. From the many reviews before us, by eminent critics, of this remarkable medley of Oriental romance and classic travel, we have space for but brief quotations:

"This is an extraordinary work in every sense of that word. . . . It seems to be the object of the writer to unite the entertainment of a novel with the information of a book of travels. . . . Anastasis and the volumes which record his memoirs form a paradox of contradiction. The Greek adventurer is acute and dull, generous and niggardly, tender-hearted and cruel; and the book, in harmony with its hero, is rational and absurd, profound and shallow, amusing and tiresome, to a degree beyond what we should have thought it possible to achieve in the same performance, if we had not seen it exemplified in the author before us."—WILLIAM GIFFORD: Lon. Quar. Rev., xiv. 511-520.

"Mr. Hope will excuse us,—but we could not help exclaiming, in reading it, 'Is this Mr. Thomas Hope?—Is this the man of chairs and tables—the gentleman of sphinxes—the Edipus of coal-boxes—he who meditated on mufflers and planned pokers?—Where has he hidden all this eloquence and poetry up to this hour?—How is it that he has, all of a sudden, burst out into descriptions which would not disgrace the pen of Tacitus—and displayed a depth of feeling, and a vigour of imagination, which Lord Byron could not excel?' We do not shrink from one syllable of this eulogium. The work now before us places him at once in the highest list of eloquent writers and of superior men. . . . The sum of our eulogium is that Mr. Hope, without being very successful in his story, or remarkably successful in the delineation of character, has written a novel, which all clever people of a certain age should read, because it is full of marvellously fine things."—SYDNEY SMITH: Edin. Rev., xxxv. 92-102; Works, Lon., 1854, ii. 172-185.

That profound classical scholar and accomplished belle-lettres critic, Edward Everett, of Massachusetts,—still, fortunately for our national reputation, living amongst us in the maturity of his extraordinary powers, and hardly even yet become "the old man eloquent,"—wrote, nearly forty years ago, for the columns of the North American Review, an elaborate review of Anastasis, which choice piece of criticism we beg to commend to the perusal of our readers. As regards the work reviewed, we can hardly advise so general a perusal.

In the words of Mr. Everett:

"We are afraid to recommend the book itself to indiscriminate perusal. Some parts are dull and some offensive; and the whole of it requires more geographical knowledge, to be read understandingly, than can be supposed to be in the possession of general readers. For, notwithstanding what we have said of the elevated character of the novel-writing of the present day, we presume no one reads a novel with a map. Without a very good map, Anastasis will be unintelligible. . . . The author has occasionally indulged in a licentiousness equally immoral and disgusting."—N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1820, xi. 271-306. See also Lon. Month. Rev., xci. 1, 131; Edin. Month. Rev., iv. 423.

"Hope has a pure and a quick fancy, and maintains the spirit and manner of his characters with remarkable consistency and truth. . . . The faults of the work are twofold: the chief character is a cold-hearted scoundrel, whom we loathe from our soul; and the language is neither prose nor poetry, but a

"Babylonish dialect

Which learned pedants most affect."

ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

We have seen that Lord Byron generally obtained the credit of the authorship of Anastasis:

"When Anastasis first made its appearance, everybody thought Lord Byron was taking to write prose; for there was no living author but Lord Byron supposed capable of having written such a book. When Byron denied the work, (and, in fact, his lordship could not have written it,) people looked about again, and wondered who the author could be. . . . The book was absolutely crammed with bold incidents and brilliant descriptions, with historical details, given in a style which Hume or Gibbon could scarcely have surpassed, and with analysis of human character and impulses, such as even Mandeville might have been proud to acknowledge."—Blackwood's Mag., xv. 51.

Such being the character of the work, we need not be surprised that Lord Byron was not offended with the imputation of its authorship:

"Byron spoke to-day in terms of high commendation of Hope's Anastasis; said that he wept bitterly over many pages of it, and for two reasons:—first, that he had not written it, and secondly, that Hope had; for that it was necessary to like a man excessively to pardon his writing such a book,—a book, as he said, excelling all recent productions as much in wit and talent as in true pathos. He added that he would have given his two most approved poems to have been the author of Anastasis."—Courtesy of Blessington's Conversations with Lord Byron.

At the time of his death Mr. Hope left two works in MS., which were subsequently given to the world, viz.:

6. An Essay on the Origin and Prospects of Man, 1831, 3 vols. 8vo. This work affords a striking illustration of the absurdities into which chimerical speculations and the vagaries of an unbalanced imagination will hurry men whose education and opportunities would have promised better things. Mr. Hope, whilst discarding the authority of the Holy Scriptures, offers us instead of them the unsupported excogitations of his own not very sober brain. He professes, indeed, to believe the Bible—just so far as he finds it to consist with his own notions of truth. But the folly and incongruity of the author's speculations have been so well exposed by Robert Southey, in his letter to Henry Taylor of July 15, 1851, (see Southey's Life and Correspondence,) that we may be excused from lingering on the subject. A review of the work—of about as little value as the book itself—will be found in the Lon. Month. Rev. for July, 1831, 390-405.

7. An Historical Essay on Architecture; illustrated by Drawings made by him in Italy and Germany, 1835, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1840, 2 vols. r. 8vo, 99 Plates, £2: Analytical Index to, by Edward Cressy, r. 8vo, 6s. An elaborate review of this work will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag. for June, 1835. Hopkins, Rev. Erasmus, b. 1810, at Hadley, Mass., settled three years in South Carolina, and four years in Troy, New York, was for seven years President of the Connecticut River Railroad Company, and has represented the town of Northampton in the Massachusetts Legislature for seven years out of the last ten. He is the author of The Family a Religious Institution, Troy, 1840; a number of Political Speeches, Reports, &c.; and some articles in the political and religious periodicals of the day.

Hopkins, Ezekiel, 1633-1690, a native of Sandford, Devonshire, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, became minister of St. Mary Woolnoth, London, and subsequently of St. Mary's, Exeter; Dean of Raphoe, 1669; Bishop of Raphoe, 1671; trans. to Londonderry, 1681. In 1688 he was driven from his diocese by the forces under the Earl of Tyrconnel; and, taking refuge in London, he was elected minister of Aldermanbury in September, 1689, and there remained until his death, June 22, 1690. His writings are greatly admired even by those who do not share his Calvinistic doctrines. 1. Treatise of the Vanity of the World, 1643. 2. Funl. Sermon, 1668. 3. Funl. Sermon, 1671. 4. Death Disarmed of its Sting, &c., 1679, 1712, 8vo. Nos. 1, 2, and 3 were reprinted (2d ed.) in 1 vol. 8vo, in 1685. 5. Sermons on Several Scriptures, 1691, vol. ii., 1693; iii., 1694; iv., 1696, all 8vo. 6. Expos. on the Lord's Prayer, with some Sermons, 1692, '98, 8vo. 7. Expos. on the Ten Commandments, with other Sermons, 1692, 4to. 8. Expos. on the Ten Commandments, with the Expos. of the Lord's Prayer; and other Sermons, 1692, 4to, pp. 822. 9. Whole Works, now first collected, 1701, fol. The two following 8vo vols., first pub. from the author's MSS. in 1712, are necessary to complete the fol. of 1701. 10. Doctrine of the Two Covenants, &c. 11. Doctrine of the Two Sacraments, &c. Watt (Bibl. Brit.) says that there was another fol. ed. in 1710; but this is disputed. If not, there was no ed. later than that of 1701, until the appearance of the Rev. Josiah Pratt's ed. of 1809, 4 vols. 8vo, £1 16s.; large paper, 4 vols. r. 8vo, £2 10s. New ed., with a Memoir of the Author, 1841, r. 8vo, 18s.; also, with a General Index of Texts and Subjects, 1841, 2 vols. r. 8vo, £1 4s. Another ed., 1843, 2 vols. r. 8vo, £1 s. There have been recent edits. of a number of Bp. Hopkins's works, pub. separately; and in 1827 the Rev. W. Wilson, D.D., pub. a Selection from the Works of Bishop Hopkins, with a brief Sketch of his Life, Lon., 18mo.

"Hopkins's motto, aut nocet aut valet, well answered his works; yet he trusted most to the latter, awakening men awfully; yet sometimes he bent the bow till it broke—an error greatly to be guarded against."—Dr. Doddridge.

"He was one of the last of that race of sound divines to which the Reformation gave birth, and who, in uninterrupted succession, had maintained in the episcopal chair the genuine doctrines of the Scripture and the English church. . . . Four excellences appear to me to be combined in him as a writer. In doctrine he is sound and discriminating; in style rich and harmonious; in illustration apt and forcible; and in application awakening and persuasive."—Rev. Josiah Pratt.

"His Works form of themselves a sound body of divinity, with some of the faults of the day in artificial distinctions and divisions. He is clear, vehement, and persuasive."—Bickerstick's C. S.

"Whatever be the nature of the subject on which he treats, his hand is instinctively seen to be that of a master: throughout we find a strength of thought, an originality of illustration, a force and felicity of style, a homely richness of expression, which command perpetual attention."—Lon. Witness.

"In Hopkins we are struck with the use of strong and forcible imagery in the illustration of his positions. His style is plain, familiar, and perspicuous, and yet without feeble and nervous. His chief excellence is that he can be plain and energetic almost at the same time. We recommend him strongly to the younger clergy."—Lon. Chris. Observer.

"The fervent and affectionate Hopkins."—Rev. James Harvey.

"Bishop Hopkins, for his excellency in that noble faculty [of preaching] was celebrated by all men. He was followed and admired in all places where he lived, and was justly esteemed one of the best preachers of our age, and his discourses always smelt of the lamp: they were very elaborate and well digested."—Prince's Worthies of Devon.

Hopkins, John, the principal successor of Thomas Sternhold in versifying the Psalms of David, was admitted A.B. at Oxford in 1544, and is supposed to have been subsequently a clergyman and schoolmaster in Suffolk. He versified fifty-eight of the Psalms, which bear his initials. The complete version was first printed (by John Day) in 1562, 4to, though portions had appeared before.

"Of his abilities as a teacher of the classics, he has left a specimen in some Latin stanzas prefixed to Fox's MARTYROLOGY. He is rather a better English poet than Sternhold."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet., q. v.

Hopkins, Samuel, D.D., 1721-1803, a descendant of Governor Hopkins of Connecticut, and the founder of the Hopkinsonian school of divinity, was a native of Waterbury, Conn., graduated at Yale College in 1741, studied theology under the celebrated Jonathan Edwards, was ordained in 1743, and was subsequently stationed successively at Great Barrington, Newport, R.I., Newburyport, Canterbury, Stamford, and again, in 1789, at Newport, where he remained until his death in 1803. His theological views were given to the world in his System of Doctrines contained in Divine Revelation explained and defended, Bost., 1793, 2 vols. 8vo; 1811, 2 vols. 8vo; and in collective ed. of his works, Phila., 1853, 3 vols. 8vo.

"The celebrity of the author, who, with Edwards and Bellamy, completes the American triumvirate of eminent writers in the same strain of divinity, would have rendered this work much more popular and useful, had he kept clear of a bold and grating statement,—that 'God has foreordained all the moral evil which does take place,' and which he endeavours to defend with more ingenuity than success."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"Hopkins sought to add to the five points of Calvinism the rather heterogeneous ingredient that holiness consists in pure, disinterested benevolence, and that all regard for self is necessarily sinful."—Hildreth's Hist. of the U. States, ed. 1854, II. 679.

Hopkins also pub. a number of occasional sermons, and theolog. treatises, &c., 1759-83; The Life of Susan Anthony, 1796; new ed., 1836, 12mo; The Life of Mrs. Osborn, 1798; a vol. of Sermons, 1803; and left Sketches of his life, and two theolog. tracts; the three last-named were pub. by Dr. West, of Stockbridge, in 1866. A collective ed. of his Works, including his System of Doctrines, with a Memoir of his Life and Character, was pub. by the Doct. Tract and Book Soc., Phila., 1853, 3 vols. 8vo. See Sketches of his Life, Works, 1853, 3 vols. 8vo; Whittier's Old Portraits and Modern Sketches; Allen's Amer. Biog. Diet.; W. E. Channing's Works; Chris. Exam., xxxiii. 169.

Hopkins, Samuel. The Youth of the Old Dominion, Bost., 1856. This work professes to be based upon historical facts:

Hopkins, William, 1708-1786, an Arian writer, a clergyman of the Church of England, a native of Menmouth, was entered at All-Souls College, Oxf., 1724;

Vicar of Bolney, Sussex, 1731; Master of the Grammar School of Cuckfield, 1756; Curate of Slingham, 1766. He pub. several anonymous pamphlets against compulsory subscription to the XXXIX. Articles, &c., but is best known by the following work: Exodus: a corrected Translation, with Notes Critical and Explanatory, Lon., 1784, 4to.

"The chief value of this translation is, that it gives all the additions and variations of the Samaritan and Septuagint. The author's heterodoxy is offensively avowed, both in the preface and notes."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"The translator has, in general, executed his task with fidelity."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

"In the notes we meet with little that can gratify the taste of critical and curious readers; and his severe reflections on the Articles and Liturgy of the Church of England might well have been spared in a work of this nature."—Lon. Month. Rev., O. S., lxvii. 412.

Hopkinson, Francis, 1737-1791, a native of Philadelphia, the son of Thomas Hopkinson, an Englishman, was educated at the college (now the University of Pennsylvania) in Philadelphia, and subsequently studied law. In 1765 we find him in England, where he resided for two years, settling, on his return, at Bordentown, New Jersey, where he married Miss Ann Borden. In 1776 he represented New Jersey in the American Congress, and was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He held for a number of years an appointment in the Loan-Office. In 1779 he was made Judge of the Admiralty in Pennsylvania, and in 1790 was appointed, by President Washington, Judge of the District Court of the United States. He died May 9, 1791, of an attack of apoplexy. He was the author of a number of poems, political pamphlets, essays, and many admirable jeux-d'esprit on the prominent topics of the day. Among the best-known of his poems are The Treaty, The Battle of the Kegs, A Morning Hymn, An Evening Hymn, Description of a Church, Science, A Camp Ballad, and The New Roof. Of his satirical pieces we may instance The Typographical Mode of Conducting a Quarrel, Thoughts on the Diseases of the Mind, Essay on White-Washing, and Modern Learning. Few pens of the day effected more than Hopkinson's in educating the American people for political independence. The brevity, wit, and vivacity of his pieces gave them portability, currency, and popular favour. Of this class—the most important—of his writings we may specify The Pretty Story, 1774; The Prophecy, 1776; The Political Catechism, 1777. But the collector of American History (a large class these collectors have now become!) must secure for his shelves, if he can, (which is more than doubtful,) The Miscellaneous Essays and Occasional Writings of Francis Hopkinson, Phila., pub. by Dobson, 1792, 3 vols. 8vo. A number of papers by Hopkinson will be found in Attkin's Pennsylvania Magazine, and in Trans. Amer. Soc., ii. 159; iii. 183, 185, 239, 331. See Allen's Amer. Biog. Diet.; Lives of the Signers; Massachusetts Mag., iii. 760-783; Amer. Mus., iii. 165; ix. 39; Duyckinck's Cyc. of Amer. Lit.; Notes on the Provincial Lit. of Penna., by Thomas I. Wharton, read at a Meeting of the Council of the Hist. Soc. of Penn., Sept. 21, 1825; Delaplaine's Repository; Works of John Adams; and other works of, and connected with, the Revolutionary times.

"A poet, a wit, a patriot, a chemist, a mathematician, and a judge of the admiralty; his character was composed of a happy union of qualities and endowments commonly supposed to be discordant; and, with the humour of Swift and Rabelais, he was always found on the side of virtue and social order."—*THOMAS I. Hopkinson, Joseph, LL.D., 1770-1842, a native of Philadelphia, son of Francis Hopkinson, (ante,) was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, and subsequently practised law, first at Easton and then in Philadelphia. From 1815 to 1819 he was a member of the national House of Representatives, and in 1823 was appointed, by President Adams, Judge of the District Court of the United States,—an office which he retained until his death. Both his father and grandfather had preceded him on the bench. The subject of our notice was Vice-President of the American Philosophical Society, and President of the Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts. He was the author of the patriotic song of "Hail Columbia," written under circumstances pleasantly recorded by the author in a letter which will be found in Griewold's Poets and Poetry of America. Horne, George, D.D., 1730-1792, an eminent divine of the Hutchinsonian school, was a native of Otham, near Maidstone, and educated at University College, Oxford; Fellow of Magdalen College, 1749, and President, 1768; Chaplain to the King, 1771; Vice-Chancellor of the Univ. of Oxford, 1776; Dean of Canterbury, 1781; Bishop of Norwich, 1790. He pub. a number of controversial treatises in favour of Hutchinson, and against Sir Isaac Newton, Adam Smith, Law, Hume, Shuckford, Kennicott, Halhed, and Priestley; a Commentary on the Book of Psalms; Sermons, &c. His Letters on Infidelity, in which Hume's arguments are discussed, were pub. in 1784, 12mo.

A collective ed. of his Works, with a Life, was pub. by his friend and chaplain, Wm. Jones, of Nayland, in 1795-99, 6 vols. 8vo; 1809, 6 vols. 8vo; 1812, 6 vols. 8vo; 1816, 6 vols. 8vo; last ed., 1830, 4 vols. 8vo. Of his Discourses, a 4th ed. was pub. in 1803-04, 5 vols. 8vo; other eds., 1812, 3 vols. 8vo; 1824, 3 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1831, 2 vols. 8vo; last ed., 1845, 2 vols. 8vo. Of the Commentary on the Psalms (1st ed., 1771, 2 vols. 4to) there have been many edits. Among the last are the one pub.

by Virtue, in 3 vols. 12mo, in 1836; the one in 2 vols. 12mo, pub. by the Lon. Soc. P. C. K. in 1848; and Longman's ed. in 1848, 8vo. See also Nisbet's ed. of Horne's Arrangement of the Psalms, Notes, and Comments, Pt. 1, 1850, p. 8vo. The Essay on Horne's Commentary, by James Montgomery, Esq., (prefixed to ed. in 2 vols., forming a portion of the Sacred Classics, and the one by the Rev. Edward Irving, (prefixed to an ed. pub. in Glasgow in 3 vols. 12mo,) are doubtless well known to many of our readers. Irving's Essay has been highly commended. The Daily Communings, Spiritual and Devotional, on Select Portions of the Psalms, from Horne's Commentary, (2d ed., 64mo,) and the Selection by Lindley Murray, (1812, 8vo,) have met with warm approbation. The last-named comprises, says Dr. T. H. Horne, "the most striking, pathetic, and instructive parts of the Commentary." A vol. of Selections from the Commentary was pub. in 1832, 12mo. It is by his Discourses and Commentary on the Psalms that Bishop Horne will always be favourably known; and it will now be proper for us to adduce some opinions upon the merits and defects of these productions.

Opinions on the Discourses:

"Some of Bishop Horne's discourses are ingenious; but they contain more Hutchinsonianism, and less of evangelical sentiment, than might have been expected."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

"Bishop Horne's views of preaching, not always (alas!) such is our common infirmity!) fully illustrated by his own sermons, are instructive. . . . His sermons are polished, and have many beautiful and excellent thoughts; but they are wanting in the full declaration of justification by faith, and therefore most not adequately the distresses of an awakened conscience. . . . His sermons are devotional and elegant. He and others of his school have brought some important truths before men who would not have listened to those writing more in the spirit of the Reformers."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"This writer seems to have had as much devotion and regard for the grand principles of Christianity as command respect; but few evangelical preachers, notwithstanding, would like to take him for a pattern."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"The sacred discourses of the amiable Horne recommend the duties of that religion of which he was so bright an ornament, in a sweet and lively style."—Historical View of Eng. Lit.: Goodenough's Eng. Genl's Lib. Man.

"His style is lucid, and often terse; his reflections grow naturally out of the sentiments of the passage on which he comments, and there breathes through the whole so much sympathy with the Psalmist in his humble views of himself and his exalted conceptions of Jehovah,—there is such a heavenly, sweet frame of mind exhibited, so much spirituality, and such love for the Redeemer,—as to render this commentary one of peculiar fitness for family reading."

"They evince an uncommon warmth of piety, and are calculated to produce it."—British Critic.

"Sensible, practical, and animated. He addresses himself more to the heart than is commonly done, and consequently his discourses are more calculated to answer the end of preaching. They are agreeably instructive and edifying, manifesting the pious and good heart of the writer."—Lon. Month. Rev.

Opinions on the Commentary on the Psalms:

"His Commentary on the Psalms is his capital performance, and the one by which he will be known so long as piety and elegant learning are loved in England. It is altogether a beautiful work. The preface is a master-piece of composition and good sense. The exposition implies more learning and research than it displays; and the views of Christian doctrine contained in it are generally very correct. Perhaps he carries his applications to the Messiah and his church occasionally rather far; but this is less hurtful than the opposite extreme, which has more generally been adopted."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

"The variety and number of the editions of this learned and pious work sufficiently attest the very high estimation in which it is held: the critics of the day, however, when it first appeared, were of opinion that Bishop Horne applied too many of the Psalms to the Messiah."—Horne's Bib. Bib.

"Horne's Commentary on the Book of Psalms is of use chiefly for its devotional tendency."—Williams's C. P.

"His Commentary on the Psalms has long been a refreshing and delightful companion in the Christian's retirement."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"It is a truly evangelical and most valuable work, generally commended and admired for the vein of spirituality and devotion which runs through it, as well as for the elegant taste displayed in the illustration of difficult passages. The author's design is to illustrate the historical sense of the Psalms as they relate to King David and the people of Israel; and to point out their application to the Messiah, to the Church, and to individuals as members of the Church."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib.

"A delightful amplification of the music of Zion, wherein every phrase is spiritualised, every prophetic and recondite meaning pointed out."—Grant's English Church.

Bishop Horne's description of a censurable style of preaching, too common even in our own days, has been already referred to in an extract from Bickersteth's Christian Student. The bishop's remarks are well worthy of quotation:

"To preach practical sermons, as they are called,—that is, sermons upon virtues and vices, without inculcating those great Scripture truths of redemption, grace, &c., which alone incite and enable us to forsake sin and to follow after righteousness,—what is it but to put together the wheels and set the hands of a watch, forgetting the spring which is to make them all go?"

For further information respecting this excellent man, see his Life, by Jones; Encyc. Brit.; Sir Wm. Forbes's Life of Dr. Beattie; Boswell's Life of Johnson; Lon. Gent. Mag., vols. lxii., lxiii., lxvi. He was a friend of Dr. Johnson's, and penned a tribute to his memory, (in the Olla Podrida;) and Johnson's biographer has left on record an honourable testimony to the character of the subject of our notice:

"We [Johnson and Boswell] drank tea with Dr. Horne, late President of Magdalen College and Bishop of Norwich, of whose abilities in different respects the public has had eminent proof, and the esteem annexed to whose character was increased by knowing him personally."—Urb. supra.

Horne, Richard Henry, b. in London, 1803, was educated at Sandhurst College, in expectation of a military appointment in the East India Company's service. Disappointed in this hope, he entered the Mexican navy as a midshipman, and served in the war against Spain until the restoration of peace. He then returned to England by the way of the United States, and settled down as a London man of letters. In 1862 he emigrated to the gold-fields of Australia, and, after serving some time as Chief of the Mounted Police, now holds the office of Gold Commissioner,—an arduous proximity seldom enjoyed by poets; though we fear the author of the Exposition of the "False Medium" has had but little opportunity as yet of testing the value of the true "medium." Mr. Horne was married in 1847 to Miss Fogg, the daughter of the artist, and for some time afterwards enjoyed an enviable seclusion in a cottage near Findley. 1. Cosmo de Medici; an Historical Tragedy, 1837, 8vo. 2. The Death of Marlowe; a Tragedy, 1838, 8vo. 3. The Death Fetch. 4. Adventures of a London Doll, 16mo. 5. The Good-natured Bear; a Story for Children, 16mo. 6. Exposition of the False Medium, and Barriers excluding Men of Genius from the Public, 1838, p. 8vo. 7. The Poor Artist; or, Seven Eye-Sights and One Object, 12mo. 8. Gregory the Seventh; a Tragedy, 1840, 8vo. Prefixed is an Essay on Tragic Influence, which has been highly commended. It is said that Mr. Horne considers Gregory the Seventh to be his best dramatic production. 9. Life of Napoleon, 1841, 2 vols. r. 8vo; 500 illustrations. New ed., 1847. 10. Orion; an Epic Poem, 1843. Several edits., the first of which was pub. at a farthing,—a "price placed upon it as a sarcasm upon the low estimation into which epic poetry has fallen."

Three large editions were sold at a farthing per copy: the 4th ed. was raised to a shilling per copy, and the 6th to half a crown.

"It is said that one day, when the author was sitting in Mr. Miller's the publisher's shop, a boy came in, and shouted out, in a nonchalant voice, 'A penn'orth of epics,' throwing a penny down on the counter."

Now, this anecdote may be true: therefore, it does not become us to deny it. We may be allowed, however, to remark, in passing, that it fits as well as if it had been "made on purpose." A very elaborate and most eulogistic review of Orion will be found in Poe's Literati. We hope the reader has time to peruse it; certain it is that we have no space to quote it.

11. A New Spirit of the Age, 1844, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Partly written and edited by R. H. Horne. The 2d ed. contains Introductory Comments upon Certain Criticisms that had appeared on the work.

The volumes are illustrated with engravings on steel, from new and original portraits, of Dickens, Tennyson, Carlyle, Wordsworth, Talfourd, Browning, Southwood Smith, and Miss Martineau.

"In the biographical sketches the editor has carefully excluded all disagreeable personalities and all unwarrantable anecdotes. The criticisms are entirely on abstract grounds. He may be often wrong, but it is with a clear conscience."—Editor's Preface.

Among the "celebrities" noticed in this work will be found Charles Dickens, Lord Ashley, Dr. Southwood Smith, Sir E. L. Bulwer, Alfred Tennyson, Sheridan Knowles, Mr. Macready, Thomas Ingoldsby, W. H. Ainsworth, T. B. Macaulay, G. P. R. James, Mrs. Gore, Captain Marryat, Mrs. Trollope, Walter Savage Landor, William and Mary Howitt, Thomas Hood, Theodore Hook, Harriet Martineau, Mrs. Jameson, Dr. Pusey, Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, Mrs. Norton, Miss E. We trust that our poet "worker" will return from the gold-fields of Australia with substantial evidences of something better than "dreams" as the employment of his exiled hours. Mr. Horne is also the author of an Introduction to Schlegel's Lectures on Dramatic Literature and Art, was the associate of Wordsworth, Leigh Hunt, Miss Barrett, and others, in the production of Chaucer Modernized, was for some time editor of the Monthly Repository, and has been a contributor to the Church of England Quarterly Review, the New Quarterly Review, and other periodicals. Among his essays in the Church of England Quarterly, we may instance those on Poetical Contrasts, and on Albertus Magnus; and, of those in the New Quarterly, it may be sufficient to name the article on Chinese Characteristics, and that on The Dramatic Mind of Europe.

"One of the most able, most liberal, and most convincing treatises in defence of our church, and of all Protestant churches in general which yet retain the truth as it is in Christ, that it has ever fallen to our lot to notice or peruse; which we recommend, without compromise or drawback of any kind, to all who desire to read a work equally deserving of attention as to its style as well as the important nature of the topic of which it treats."—Lon. Chris. Remembrancer.

Horne, Thomas Hartwell, D.D., b. Oct. 20, 1780, received the rudiments of a classical education between the years 1789 and '95 in the royal and ancient foundation of Christ's Hospital, where, for two years, he was contemporary with Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Having attained the rank of Deputy-Grecian, (the second highest class in the upper grammar-school,) he quitted Christ's Hospital at the age of fifteen years, having no opportunity of proceeding to the university. The eldest of six orphans, small of stature, and not robust, he was unfitted for any employment requiring physical strength; and eight years of his life were spent in the humble situation of a clerk to barristers. As he had a good deal of time at his command during the first five years of his career, he diligently improved himself by solitary study, and acquired an insight into the law of England, which he was afterwards enabled to turn to account in editing various law-books. The very narrow income which he received as a barrister's clerk early led Mr. Horne to direct his attention to literature as a means of support. His first publication was A Brief View of the Necessity and Truth of the Christian Revelation, written when he was only eighteen, and published in 1800, in his nineteenth year. The publication of this little manual led him to the diligent and prayerful study of the Scriptures, and eventually induced him to undertake the work by which he is best known in this country as well as in England, and, indeed, wherever the English language is spoken or read. We mean the Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. In the preface to this work, Mr. Horne states that it

"Originated in his own wants at an early period of life, when he stood in need of a guide to the reading of the Holy Scriptures, which would not only furnish him with a general introduction to them, but would also enable him to solve apparent contradictions, and to study the Bible with that attention which its importance demands."

At that time he "Had no friend to assist his studies or remove his doubts, nor any means of procuring critical works. At length a list of the more eminent foreign Biblical critics fell into his hands, and directed him to some of those sources of information which he was seeking. He then resolved to procure such of them as his very limited means would permit, with the design, in the first instance, of satisfying his own mind on those topics which had perplexed him, and, ultimately, of laying before the public the result of his inquiries, should no treatise appear that might supersede such a publication."—Vol. i. Pref., pp. ix., x.

The idea thus conceived fifty-eight years ago has been steadily kept in view to the present time. The foundation and much of the subsequent composition of this work were laid, for the most part, in solitary midnight study. However much and variously he was engaged in literary toil for his daily bread, (as the subjoined list of his publications will attest,) the Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures was the first and chief object of his thoughts. The 1st edition of it appeared in 1818 in 3 vols. 8vo, which in subsequent editions were enlarged into five thick octavo volumes. It immediately took its station in literature as THE CLASS-BOOK for the study of the Scriptures in all the colleges and universities in the British dominions. The author has been spared to see the publication of the 10th edition in 1856,—thirty-eight years after the publication of the 1st edition,—and to receive increasing testimonies of its utility to all classes of readers, but especially to ministers and students for the ministry. From the very numerous critical testimonies in favour of this invaluable work, we select the following:

The first edition:

"Of all the works which of late years have been presented to the notice of the Biblical student, this is one of the most correct and useful. It is an encyclopædia of theological knowledge. It is a complete abridgment of many extensive treatises of the most celebrated divines both of our own and foreign countries; and it entitles its author to the gratitude and approbation of every lover of the sacred volume."—Classical Journal, Sept. 1819.

"This elaborate work reflects great credit on the learning and industry of its author, and is, upon the whole, well calculated to answer the purposes for which it was designed."—British Critic, June, 1819.

"It is saying much,—yet, as far as our knowledge of Biblical works extends, not too much,—to assert of these volumes, that they constitute the most important theological publication of their kind which has appeared in this or any other country for some years."

"No well-assorted theological library can be long without it; and even those students in divinity whose pecuniary resources are too limited to admit of wanton expenditure would do well, on the score of economy, to include these volumes in their library."—Christian Observer, November, 1819.

"This work contains every information which the general reader of Scripture can possibly require; but to clergymen, and to those who are preparing for the sacred office, it is an invaluable manual; and (what is no mean consideration) it is also a cheap one."—Literary Panorama, September, 1818.

"It is all it pretends to be, and even more, being written with a judicious perspicuity, and executed with a degree of correctness that we do not often witness."—Evangelical Magazine, Oct. 1818.

The second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth editions:

"Upon the whole, it is a very useful publication, and does great credit to the industry and researches of the indefatigable author."—Bishop Marsh's Lectures on the Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible, pp. 52, 53, ed. of 1823.

"I would advise the younger clergy, and candidates for Holy Orders, to acquaint themselves, in an early stage of their critical researches, with Horne's Introduction to the Study of the Scripture; a work which in itself comprises a body of critical theology, and which introduces the reader to the best sources of information."—Bishop Jebb's Primary Charge to the Clergy of the Diocese of Limerick, in 1823, p. 10, (Dublin, 1823.)

"T. Hartwell Horne has not only analysed with extraordinary diligence all the principal writers on the Evidences of Christianity, but has supplied the defects of many of them, by enforcing those moral and religious considerations arising from the intrinsic excellency of Christianity and the responsibility of man, which, in the author's judgment, are so unspeakably important."—Bishop Wilson's (of Calcutta) Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity, vol. I, Pref., p. xiv.

"Such a monument of successful industry and luminous arrangement as the present age has seldom seen; a copious instruction for every young theologian, and an ample treasure of reminiscence to the most accomplished."—Archdeacon Nares's Visitation Sermon before the Archdeacon and Clergy of the City of London, in 1823, p. 24.

"So comprehensive and complete as quite to supersede many works that would otherwise have been necessary."—Bickerdell's Christian Student, p. 464, (London, 1829.)

"Great advantages may be derived from the repeated perusal of Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures, in 4 vols. 8vo. . . . It contains much invaluable information respecting the ancient manuscripts and versions of the sacred books, the care with which they were preserved before the invention of printing, the manner in which they have been transmitted to our own times, together with a full view of Jewish Antiquities, and a suitable introduction to prepare the reader for entering on the study of each inspired book."—Gibbs's Directions for Searching the Scriptures, p. 38, (Edinburgh, 1829.)

"Read Martwell Horne. This is an invaluable book for a young man; and you must not lay him aside till you have fully digested his admirable compilations, to guide you in more discursive reading hereafter."—Letter to a Young Man matriculating at the University: Domestic Portraits, &c., p. 128, (London, 8vo, 1833.)

"Every Biblical student may be congratulated on the opportunity which he possesses of acquiring, in these approved volumes, the most comprehensive digest of Biblical erudition extant in English Literature."—Lon. Eclectic Review, January, 1823.

"One of the most valuable works that exists in this or any other language."—Edinburgh Christian Instructor, May, 1833.

"Ouvrage important, qui réunit de nombreux renseignements géographiques, historiques, bibliographiques, et critiques, relatifs à la littérature biblique."—BAUNET: Supplément au Manuel du Libraire, tom. II, p. 300, (Paris, 1834, 8vo.)

The seventh edition:

"It augurs well for the cause of Biblical Literature in this country, that edition after edition of this important and increasingly valuable work should so rapidly issue from the press. When the laborious and learned author entered the field, it was comparatively unoccupied; and now, after the lapse of fifteen years, notwithstanding all that has been done for promoting the critical study and knowledge of the Bible among us, he may still be said to occupy it unvalued and alone. During the whole of that period he has evidently availed himself of every new source that has been opened, from which to derive improvements; diligently canvassed the pages both of domestic and foreign literature; re-examined authorities and quotations; and left no measure unemployed by which his work might receive that degree of perfection of which, from the nature of the circumstances, it was susceptible."—Congregational Magazine, September, 1834.

"A work which is beyond all contradiction the most valuable introduction to the Sacred Writings which has been ever published. It is a storehouse of Biblical learning; and we recommend it the more cordially to our readers, as it may be put into the hands of students with the most perfect safety."—Christian Remembrancer, October, 1834.

The eighth edition:

"It is needless that we should say any thing to commend such a publication. It is one of the first books which should be secured by the young minister; and the intelligent and reading of every class, ministers and laymen, will find ample reward in the perusal of its richly-stored pages."—Lon. Eclectic Review, April, 1839.

"These admirable volumes are too well known to require either description or recommendation: their character is now established, both as a standard work and as a complete encyclopedia of Biblical knowledge. . . . The publication of this new and improved edition will afford the opportunity to a number of persons, candidates for the ministry or otherwise, to become purchasers. Young ministers and students ought to possess it. Instead of that desultory and superficial reading, which imparts much less information than it seems to do, and leaves the mind undisciplined, they ought to lay before them (in connexion with suitable works in doctrinal theology) Mr. Horne's text-book of a vast subject, and diligently and patiently pursue the subject for two or three years. But we see no necessity for confining the work to ministers and ministerial students. . . . We recommend Mr. Horne's work as a family work, to which the youthful members may have access, and with which they may become thoroughly acquainted."—Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, March, 1839.

"In every theological library this work is indispensable. It contains a singular display of good sense and persevering industry, and is by far the most complete publication of the kind that ever issued from the British press, or perhaps in any language. There is scarcely a question relating to the study of the Holy Scriptures, which is not here discussed in an able and satisfactory manner. As long as a taste for sound Biblical Literature shall be cherished, this work will secure for its author the highest esteem and grateful respect."—Second Appendix to Dr. Williams's Christian Preacher, 4th edition, p. 356, (London, 1843.)

Ninth edition:

"Mr. Horne's great work has been too long before the public to need a formal introduction to the notice of either lay or clerical readers. The appearance of a ninth edition sufficiently attests the estimation in which it is deservedly held: nor do we hazard too much when we assert that it has undoubtedly raised the character of theological and Biblical literature throughout Christendom. There is, in fact, scarcely a single question relating to the study of the Scriptures, which Mr. Horne has not ably discussed and authoritatively settled. His Introduction is one of those works with which Biblical students and candidates for Holy Orders cannot too soon make themselves thoroughly acquainted, and the acquisition of which they will never regret."—Church and State Gazette, 1846.

The 10th edition passed through the press in the same month as that in which this article was written, (Nov. 1856.) Our own obligations to this work in the preparation of this Dictionary will be best understood by the many references to the INTRODUCTION scattered through our pages; though these extracts, valuable as they are, do not fully express the amount of our indebtedness to this admirable repository of Biblical literature. The tone of Christian charity and gentlemanly courtesy, united with a zealous defence of what he believes to be sound doctrine, which distinguishes the criticisms of Dr. Horne, cannot escape the notice of the readers of the INTRODUCTION.

Besides the ten editions printed in England, Mr. Horne's work has been repeatedly reprinted in the United States, but without any pecuniary advantage to the author, in 2 vols. imp. 8vo, and also in 4 vols. 8vo, to the amount of many thousand copies; which, added to the aggregate number of 18,000 copies of the first nine London editions, exhibits an unprecedented sale for a work of this character; especially when the bulk and price are considered. This extensive circulation may be ascribed, in part at least, to the facts that the Introduction has throughout been the joint result of prayer and indefatigable study, regardless of expense in procuring the requisite critical aids, and that it is not a sectarian work. Christians of every denomination have studied it to their great advantage; and Mr. Horne, in the course of his long life (he is now in the 78th year of his age) has been permitted to receive not a few testimonies from persons who have been preserved or rescued from infidelity by his labours. Mr. Kennedy, the biographer of our distinguished countryman, William Wirt, states that

"To Horne's Introduction, particularly, he was accustomed to express his obligations for the conviction of his own mind; and he never lost an opportunity of commending it to a friend."

In his letters to his children, among other books on the subject of religion, he "Urged them to the careful perusal of Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures."—Kennedy's Memoirs of W. Wirt, vol. II, p. 338.

It has, in fact, conducted more than any other modern work to the enlarged study of sacred literature; and eventually it led to the realization of Mr. Horne's long-cherished wish of devoting himself to the ministry in the Church of England. The death of his parents having prevented him from prosecuting his studies at either of the English universities, Dr. Howley, at that time Bishop of London, disregarded his want of an English academical degree, and, considering his Introduction as an appropriate and honourable passport to Holy Orders, ordained him in 1819. In the preceding year the University of King's College, Aberdeen, conferred on Mr. Horne the degree of M.A. In 1829 Mr. Horne performed the academical exercises required by the University Statutes, and proceeded to the degree of B.D. in the University of Cambridge; and in 1841 the University of Pennsylvania conferred upon Mr. H. the degree of D.D. In 1833 Dr. Howley (then Archbishop of Canterbury) presented him to the rectory of St. Edmund-the-King with St. Nicholas Acons, in the city of London, as a small token of his esteem for Mr. Horne's personal worth, and his sense of the services which Mr. H. had rendered by his works to the theological and Biblical student. Dr. Blomfield, Bishop of London, had previously collated him to the prebend of Snating in the Cathedral of St. Paul, as a mark of the esteem which the bishop entertained of the value of those services which Mr. Horne had rendered to the cause of Christianity by his different publications, especially his Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures. As the population of the United Parishes (of which Mr. H. is rector) is small, he has found time to produce many valuable publications, and also to keep up an extensive correspondence with literary men, and especially with those who are engaged in controversy with the advocates of the modern Church of Rome. Several of his publications were written primarily for the edification of his parishioners and their families, by whom they were gratefully received and acknowledged. It only remains to state, in concluding this notice of Mr. Horne's literary career; that in 1809 he was elected Sub-Librarian of the Surrey Institution, which office he held until the institution was dissolved for want of the requisite funds, in 1823. In 1824 he was applied to, and eventually engaged, by the then Trustees of the British Museum, to undertake a classed catalogue of that library. For their consideration, and by their desire, he drew up the Outlines for the Classification of a Library, which were printed in 1826. After very considerable progress had been made in that classed catalogue, it was suspended for a new General Alphabetical Catalogue, which is now in progress, and on which Mr. Horne is still employed as an Assistant Librarian. If that classed catalogue had been completed, it would, on a large scale, have been what Mr. Horne's valuable classed catalogue of Queen's College Library, Cambridge, is on a smaller scale. The following is a correct list of Mr. Horne's publications:

1. A Brief View of the Necessity and Truth of the Christian Revelation, Lon., 1800; 2d ed., 1802, 8vo.
2. A View of the Commerce of Greece, by Felix Beaujour; translated from the French, 1800, 8vo.
3. An Essay on Privateers, Captures, and Recaptures, according to the Laws, Treaties, and Usages of the Maritime Powers of Europe, by M. de Martens. To which is subjoined a Discourse, in which the Rights and Duties of Neutral Powers are briefly stated; translated from the French, 1801.
4. A Compendium of the Statute Laws and Regulations of the Court of Admiralty relative to Ships of War, Privateers, Prizes, Recaptures, and Prize-Money; with an Appendix of Precedents, 1803, 12mo.
5. Wallis's Pocket Itinerary; being a New and Accurate Guide to all the Principal, Direct, and Cross-Roads throughout England, Wales, and Scotland, 1803, 18mo. Anon.
6. A Treatise on Captures in War, by Richard Lee, Esq.; 2d ed., corrected, with additional Notes by Mr. Horne, 1803, 8vo.
7. Hints on the Formation and Management of Sunday-Schools, 1807, 12mo. Anon.
8. A Reading upon the Statute of Sewers, by Robert Callis, Sergeant-at-Law; 4th ed., corrected and enlarged by Mr. Horne, 1810, r. 8vo.
9. Bibliotheca Legum; or, a Complete Catalogue of the Common and Statute Law-Books of the United Kingdom, arranged in a new manner, by John Clarke. The materials were collected by the publisher, Mr. Clarke; but the whole were arranged, corrected, and edited by Mr. Horne, 1810, 8vo. See CLARKE, JOHN.
10. A Catalogue of the Library of the Surrey Institution, methodically arranged, 1811; 2d ed., 1812, 8vo. Anon.
11. A Catalogue of the Harleian Manuscripts in the British Museum, classed according to their Subject-Matter; forming the 4th vol. of the Catalogue of the Harleian Manuscripts, 1812, 8vo.
12. An Introduction to the Study of Bibliography; to which is prefixed a Memoir on the Public Libraries of the Antients, 1814, 2 vols. 8vo.
13. A Compendious Law Dictionary, by Thomas Potts; a new ed., carefully revised, corrected, and enlarged, by Mr. Horne, 1815, 8vo and 12mo.
14. An Illustrated Record of Important Events in the Annals of Europe during the years 1812, '13, '14, and '15, fol. Anon.
15. The Lakes of Lancashire, Westmoreland, and Cumberland, delineated in 48 Engravings after the Drawings of Joseph Farington, R.A.; with Descriptions, Historical, Topographical, and Picturesque, the result of a Tour made by T. H. Horne in the year 1816, 1816, fol.
16. The History of the Mohammedan Empire in Spain; designed as an Introduction to the Arabian Antiquities of Spain, by James Cavanagh Murphy, 1816, 4to. This volume was written in conjunction with John Gillies, LL.D., and Mr. Professor John Shakspere, of the East India College. One-half of this volume was contributed by Mr. Horne; who also edited Mr. Murphy's Arabian Antiquities of Spain, 1816, fol., Mr. M. having died without leaving any materials for the descriptions of the engravings.
17. An Analysis of the Picture of the Transfiguration, by Raffaello Sanzio d'Urbino; translated from the French of S. C. Croze-Maignan, by Mr. Horne, with the Remarks and Observations of Vasari, Mengs, Reynolds, Fuseli, and other distinguished artists, 1817, fol.
18. An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, with Maps and Fac-Similes of Biblical Manuscripts, 1818, 3 vols. 8vo; 9th ed., revised, corrected, and enlarged, by Mr. Horne, 1846, 5 large vols. 8vo; 10th ed., by Mr. Horne, with the assistance of Samuel Davidson, D.D., LL.D., and of Samuel Pridemore Tregelles, LL.D., 1856, 4 vols. in 5, 8vo, (vide ante). In the 10th ed., the valuable bibliographical volume of Mr. Horne has been necessarily (though on his part most reluctantly) omitted in order to make room for much new critical matter. Part of Mr. Horne's first volume, on the Internal Evidences of the Inspiration of the Scriptures, was translated into Romain, or modern Greek, by Professor Nicholas Bambeas, (afterwards of the University of Athens,) and published in 1834, at Hermopolis, in the island of Syra, and was largely circulated in Greece. The translation is entitled, Εσωτερικαί ἀποδείξεις της θεϊνότητος των γραφών. Γραφία, ἀποδιδωμένη τίς ταύτα διδρασκόν, ἐκ του Ἀγγλίου μεταφράσας τις Ν. Βαμβα. Εκ Ερμηνόπολης, 1834.

19. Deism Refuted; or, Plain Reasons for being a Christian, Lon., 1819, 12mo. Reprinted at Philadelphia, 1820, 12mo; 6th ed., Lon., 1826, 12mo. This little volume, with Mr. Horne's permission, contributed five tracts to the series published by the London Religious Tract Society, viz.: Nos. 316, 318, 319, 321, and 701.

20. The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity briefly stated and defended, and the Church of England vindicated from the charge of Uncharitableness in retaining the Athanasian Creed, 1820; 2d ed., corrected, 1826, 12mo.

21. Commentaries on the Roman-Dutch Law, by Simon van Leeuwen, LL.D.; translated from the Dutch by a Cingalese Meddler, or Native Magistrate: collated throughout with Van Leeuwen's Censura Forensis, and edited, with numerous additional references to the Text-Books on the Roman Civil Law, by Mr. Horne, 1820, r. 8vo. Nearly the whole edition of this work was sent to the island of Ceylon, where it is of the highest authority.

22. The Works of William Hogarth, (including the Analysis of Beauty), elucidated by Descriptions, critical, moral, and historical; to which is prefixed Some Account of his Life, by Mr. Horne. The engravings were executed by Thomas Clerk, an engraver at Edinburgh, 1821, 2 vols. 8vo.

23. Outlines for the Classification of a Library, respectfully submitted to the consideration of the Trustees of the British Museum, by Mr. Horne, 1826, 4to.

24. A Catalogue of the Library of the College of St. Bernard and St. Margaret, commonly called Queen's College, in the University of Cambridge; methodically arranged, 1827, 2 vols. r. 8vo. This catalogue is classified according to the principles and order developed in the preceding Outlines for the Classification of a Library.

25. Romanism contradictory to the Bible; or, the Peculiar Tenets of the Church of Rome, as exhibited in her accredited Formularies, contrasted with the Holy Scriptures, Lon., 1827, 8vo. Translated into Spanish by the Rev. W. H. Rule, and printed at Gibraltar in 1840.

26. A Compendious Introduction to the Study of the Bible; being an Analysis of the Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, Lon., 1827, 12mo. Reprinted at Boston, Mass., 1827, 12mo; 9th ed., 1852, 12mo. This is an abridgment of Mr. Horne's larger Introduction.

27. A Manual of Parochial Psalmody, adapted to the services of the Church for every Sunday, &c. throughout the Year, Lon., 1829; 40th ed., 1856, 18mo; also eds. in 12mo and 32mo.

28. A Selection (by Mr. Horne) of Psalm and Hymn-Tunes, by the Best Composers, ancient and modern; the whole harmonised and arranged for the Manual of Parochial Psalmody, by Thomas Henshaw, 1829. New ed., 1852, ob. 8vo.

29. The Conversion of St. Paul a Proof of the Truth of the Christian Revelation, 1831, 8vo. An anonymous Tract, written for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

30. A Manual for the Afflicted; comprising a Practical Essay on Afflictions, and a Series of Meditations and Prayers for those who are in sorrow, trouble, need, sickness, or any other adversity, 1832; 2d ed., 1843, 18mo. Reprinted at Boston, Mass., 1833, 18mo.

31. Bibliographical Notes on the Book of Jasher, Lon., 1833, 8vo. This detection of a gross literary forgery was subsequently incorporated in the fifth or bibliographical volume of the Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures.

32. A Concise History and Analysis of the Athanasian Creed, with Select Scripture Proofs, and answers to some common objections, 1834; 2d ed., 1837, 18mo.

33. A Protestant Memorial; comprising—I. A Concise Historical Sketch of the Reformation; II. The Antiquity of the Religion of Protestants Demonstrated; III. The Safety of adhering to the Protestant Church, and the Dangtr of continuing in the Church of Rome; IV. Romanism, or the System of Doctrine and Precepts maintained and inculcated by the Church of Rome, contradictory to the Bible, 1835; 10th ed., enlarged, 1850, 12mo.

34. Landscape Illustrations of the Bible; from Original Sketches taken on the Spot and engraved by W. and E. Finden, with Descriptions by Mr. Horne, 1836, 2 vols. 8vo, and fol. The Biblical Keepsake; a new ed. of the preceding work, with additions and corrections, 1835-37, 3 vols. 8vo.

35. A Manual of Biblical Bibliography, 1839, 8vo. This is a separate edition of the fifth or bibliographical volume of the eighth edition of Mr. Horne's Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures: it was published by request, for the accommodation of bookbuyers and booksellers.

36. The Principles of Popery Developed, in a juridical and historical investigation of the Gunpowder-Conspiracy; reprinted from the Church of England Quarterly Review, 1840, 8vo. Anon.

37. Mariolatry; or, Facts and Evidences demonstrating the Worship of the Virgin Mary by the Church of Rome, 1840, 8vo. Anon. Reprinted, with additions and corrections furnished by Mr. Horne to the American editor, the Rev. S. F. Jarvis, D.D., Hartford, Conn., 1844, 8vo.

38. A new edition, with corrections and additions, of Dr. J. Williams's (Bishop of Chichester) Brief Exposition of the Church Catechism, with Scripture-Proofs, Lon., 1841, 12mo.

39. Popery the Enemy and Falsifier of Scripture; or, Facts and Evidences illustrative of the conduct of the Modern Church of Rome, in prohibiting the Reading and Circulation of the Holy Scriptures in the Vulgar Tongue, and also of the Falsification of the Sacred Text in Translations executed by Romanists, 1844, 8vo. Anon. 2d ed., corrected and enlarged, 1845, 18mo.

40. Popery Delineated; or, a Brief Examination and Confutation of the Unscriptural and Anti-Scriptural Doctrines and Practices maintained and inculcated by the Modern Church of Rome, 1848, 8vo. Anon.

41. The Communicant's Companion; comprising an Historical Essay on the Lord's Supper, with Meditations and Prayers for the use of Communicants, 1855, 32mo.

Besides numerous sermons communicated to different journals, Mr. Horne has also published the following single sermons on various public occasions:

42. The Conformity of the Church of England, in her Ministry, Doctrine, and Liturgy, to the Apostolic Precept and Pattern; to which is added an Address on the Origin and Use of Confessions of Faith generally, and of the Confession of Faith of the United Church of England and Ireland in particular, 1834; 3d ed., corrected and enlarged, 1835, 8vo.

43. Jewish and Christian Privileges Compared; Christian Diligence; Patriotism a Religious Duty: Three Sermons preached before the Lord-Mayor, Judges, and Members of the Corporation of the City of London, in the year 1837, 1837, 4to.

44. The Sovereign's Prayer and the People's Duty; a Sermon on occasion of the Coronation of Queen Victoria, 1838, 8vo.

45. National Piety and National Prosperity inseparably connected; a Fast-Day Sermon, delivered April 26, 1854, 1854, 8vo.

Dr. Horne has further contributed numerous Historical-Ecclesiastical and Literary Articles to the Encyclopædia Metropolitana; and also many articles to critical journals, exposing the Principles, Doctrines, and Practices of the Modern Church of Rome.

When the character, the number, and the extensive circulation of Dr. Horne's works are duly considered, we shall hardly be accused of exaggeration when we express our conviction that a more useful uninspired writer has seldom appeared among men. The influence of his excellent Introduction to the Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures (to instance only the most important of his works) has now for a period of nearly forty years directed the instructions and moulded the lives of thousands of the clergy and hundreds of thousands of the laity of two hemispheres. He has now attained the ripe age of seventy-eight. May he live to see the publication of this Dictionary, in the progress of which kindred pursuits and an expansive benevolence of heart have led him to take a lively interest. He was one of our earliest guides in Bibliography: we very naturally wish him to behold the matured fruits of our anxious toils.

Horneck, Anthony, D.D., 1641-1698, a native of Bacharach, in the Lower Palatinate, studied at Heidelberg, and was entered at Queen's Coll., Oxf., 1663; Vicar of All-Saints, Oxf., 1663; became Preb. of Exeter, and subsequently of Westminster and Wells; Preacher in the Savoy, 1671. He was a man of great piety and profound learning. He was the author of a number of serms. and theolog. treatises, of which the following are the best-known: 1. The Great Law of Consideration, Lon., 1677, 8vo; 11th ed., 1729, 8vo. New ed., 1840, 8vo.

"Devout and edifying."—Bickersteth's C. S.

2. The Happy Ascetic, Lon., 1681, 8vo; 3d ed., 1693, 8vo. New ed., 1724, 8vo. 3. The Fire of the Altar, 1683, 12mo. 4. The Exercise of Prayer, 1685, 8vo; 13th ed., 1718, 12mo. New ed., 1845, 18mo. This is a Supp. to No. 2. 5. The Crucified Jesus; or, an Acct. of the Nature, Design, &c. of the Lord's Supper, 1686, 8vo; 6th ed., 1716, 8vo. New ed., 1839, 12mo.

"Devotional."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"His best pieces are those upon Consideration and the Crucified Jesus."—Dr. Doddridge.

6. Several Serms. on Matt. v., 1706, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1717, 2 vols. 8vo. Pub. by Bishop Kidder, (of Bath and Wells,) who has prefixed a Memoir. The bishop remarks, referring to the works of Horneck which were pub. by the author:

"There is a great vein of piety and devotion which runs through them; they savour of the primitive simplicity and zeal, and are well fitted to make men better."

Dr. T. H. Horne tells us that

"The bishop's character of the writings published by himself [Horneck] is equally applicable to his Sermons on Matt. v."—Bibl. Bib.

Horneck's Works are also commended by another eminent authority as "Exceedingly pathetic and elegant; chiefly fit for devotional subjects: his words are often much greater than his thoughts."—Dr. Doddridge.

Horneck, Wm. Modern Fortification, Lon., 1738, 4to.

Horner, Francis, M.P., 1778-1817, a native of Edinburgh, educated at the High School, and at the University of that city, subsequently studied law, and became a member of Parliament, where he distinguished himself by his knowledge of political economy and finance. Having injured his constitution by excessive labour in the discharge of his duties as a member of the Bullion Committee, and in other capacities, he was obliged to travel on the Continent for the benefit of his health; but his unfavourable symptoms increased, and he died at Pisa, Feb. 8, 1817, in the 38th year of his age. A statue has been erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey. As the author of the first part of the Bullion Report of 1810, (the second part was penned by Mr. Huskisson and the third by Henry Thornton,) Mr. Horner is entitled to a high rank as a political economist. But he was more than this; he was a diligent student of intellectual philosophy, a man of great elevation of character, and unblemished purity in private life. His views on the Currency, which he subsequently embodied in the Report of the Bullion Committee, will be found in the first number of the Edinburgh Review, in his Review of Thornton on the Paper Credit of Great Britain. Of this periodical he was one of the originators. His Memoirs and Correspondence were pub. by his brother, Leonard Horner, in 1843, Lon., 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., with addita., 1853, 2 vols. 8vo; Boston, by Little, Brown & Co., 1853, 2 vols. 8vo. We could quote many pages of commendation from high authorities of Mr. Horner's character as a man and statesman, but must be satisfied with referring the reader to the Memoirs of Sir Samuel Romilly, 1840, 3 vols.; Sir Archibald Alison's Hist. of Europe, 1789-1815; Lord Brougham's Statesmen temp. Geo. III., Lon., 1854, ii. 155-166; Works of Sir James Mackintosh, 1854, i. 214-215, n.; Works of the Rev. Sydney Smith, 1854, iii. 473-477, (Letter to Leonard Horner); Lord Cockburn's Memorial of his Own Time, 1856; Dugald Stewart's Prelim. Dissert. to Enycy. Brit.; Chambers and Thomson's Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen, 1855, iii. 86-90; McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 173, 297; Edin. Rev., lxxviii. 261; Lon. Quar. Rev., June, 1827, lxxii. 108; Eccl. Rev., 4th Ser., xiii. 506; Blackw. Mag., i. 3; xvii. 515; xl. 114; Lon. Gent. Mag., 1825, Pt. 1, 593; 1843, 3; N. York Eccl. Mus., iii. 536. But we feel unwilling to conclude without quoting some testimonies to the eminent merits of Francis Horner:

"I remember the death of many eminent Englishmen; but I can safely say I never remember an impression so general as that excited by the death of Francis Horner."—REV. SYDNEY SMITH: ubi supra.

"The tears of those to whom he was unknown were shed over him. . . . He raised himself, at the early age of thirty-six, to a moral authority which, without these qualities, no brilliancy of talents or power of reasoning could have acquired. No eminent speaker of Parliament owed so much of his success to his moral character. His high place was therefore honourable to his audience and to his country."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: ubi supra.

"He died at the age of thirty-eight; possessed of greater public influence than any other private man, and admired, beloved, trusted, and deplored, by all except the heartless or the base. No greater homage was ever paid in Parliament to any deceased member."—LORD COCKBURN: ubi supra.

"Considering his knowledge, his talents, his excellent judgment, and the prospect of years which he had before him, I consider his death as a great public calamity."—SIR SAMUEL ROSSLYN: ubi supra.

"Mr. Horner, whose premature and lamented death alone prevented him from rising to the highest eminence on the opposition side."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: ubi supra.

"Never certainly was more completely realized the ideal portrait so nobly imagined by the Roman poet: a calm devotion to reason and justice, the sanctuary of the heart undisturbed, and a breast glowing with inborn honour.

"Compositum jus fasque animo, sanctoque recessus Mentis, et incoctum generoso pectus honesto."

DUGALD STEWART: ubi supra.

"But this able, accomplished, and excellent person was now approaching the term assigned to his useful and honourable course by the mysterious dispensations under which the world is ruled. A complication of extraordinary maladies soon afterwards (after the Parliamentary session of 1816) precluded all further exertion, and, first confining his attention to the care of his health, before a year was over from the date of his last brilliant display, brought him, deeply and universally lamented, to an untimely grave.

"Extendit terribi hunc tantum fata, neque ultra
Esse sinit. Nihilum vobis Romana propago
Vim potens, Superi, propria hæc si dona fuissent."

Horrox, Jeremiah, 1619-1641, an eminent English astronomer, a native of Toxteth, near Liverpool, was educated at Emanuel College, and subsequently (as Mr. Rigaud has recently discovered) took holy orders and became a curate at Hooles, near Preston.

"He was the first who saw Venus in the body of the sun. (Nov. 24, 1639) and he was the first who remarked that the lunar motions might be represented by supposing an elliptic orbit, provided that the eccentricity of the ellipse were made to vary, and an oscillatory motion given to the line of apses. Newton afterwards showed that both suppositions were consequences of the theory of gravitation, and attributes to Halley part of what is really due to Horrox, as explained by Flamsteed."

Horrox's investigations—remarks the reviewer of Rigaud's Historical Essay on the First Publication of Sir Isaac Newton's Principia, 1838, 8vo—

"Are all stamped with the clear indications of a genius of the first order; and he doubtless would have achieved far greater discoveries had not his privations and successes, his toils and triumphs, been together cut short by his premature death in 1641."—Edin. Rev., lxxviii. 402-438: Sir Isaac Newton and his Contemporaries.

"There is reason to ascribe an invention of great importance, though not perhaps of extreme difficulty, that of the micrometer, to Horrox."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1844, II. 196.

"Horrox has the merit of being among the first who rightly appreciated the discoveries of the astronomer just named, [Kepler.]"—PROFESSOR PLAYFAIR: 3d Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

It is not a little to Horrox's credit, that, whilst the astronomical tables of the day—even his master Kepler's (founded on the observations of Tycho Brahe)—were incorrect in their calculations respecting the time of the transit of Venus, the young astronomer himself foretold the time very accurately. 1. Horsley, John, 1685-1731, an eminent antiquary, a native of Mid-Lothian, of a Northumberland family, was pastor of a dissenting congregation at Morpeth. Britannia Romana; or, the Roman Antiquities of Britain; in three Books, Lon., 1782, fol. An analysis of this truly valuable work will be found in Savage's Librarian. Sir P. Thompson's copy was sold for £13 3s., and Willett's for £14; Heath's, large paper, for £28 17s. 6d., and Constable's, large paper, for £35 10s. These are the highest prices with which we are acquainted. Horsley left a number of unfinished works in MS.; some letters of his, addressed to Roger Gale, dated 1729, will be found in Hutchinson's View of Northumberland. See Life of Horsley, by Rev. John Hodgson; Chambers and Thompson's Biog. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen; Nichols's Lit. Anec.

Horsley, John. Longitude at Sea; Phil. Trans., 1764.

Horsley, Samuel, LL.D., 1733-1806, a native of London, was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge; Curate to his father, who was Rector of Newington Butts, 1768; Rector of Newington Butts, 1769; Secretary of the Royal Society, 1773; Rector of Aldbury, Surrey, 1774; Preb. of St. Paul's, 1777; Archdeacon of St. Alban's, 1780; Rector of Southwold, Essex, 1782; Preb. of Gloucester, 1787; Bishop of St. David's, 1788; trans. to Rochester, with the Deanery of Westminster, 1793; trans. to St. Asaph, resigning the Deanery of Westminster, 1802. He was a man of profound learning and strong intellectual powers, dictatorial in controversy, but most benevolent in heart. He was a useful member of the Royal Society, and made considerable attainments in mathematics, the classics, natural philosophy, and astronomy. A number of his astronomical, mathematical, and other papers will be found in Phil. Trans., 1767-76. His name is best known in connexion with his controversy with Dr. Priestley respecting the faith of the Primitive Christians concerning the nature of Christ. In his (1.) History of the Corruptions of Christianity, pub. in 1782, 2 vols. 8vo, the former placed at the head of these both Trinitarianism and Arianism; contending that the Socinian doctrine of the mere humanity of Christ was the unanimous faith of the first believers. This position was combated by Horsley, in his Charge of May 22, 1783, pub. 1783, 4to. Priestley replied in his Letters to Dr. Horsley, 1783, 8vo; and thus the war was fairly commenced. For further information on this head, the reader is referred to the authorities cited below: Horsley's Tracts in Controversy with Dr. Priestley, 8d ed., with Notes and Appendix by Rev. Heneage Horsley, Dundee, 1812, 8vo; and to Priestley's Tracts in Controversy with Bishop Horsley, with Notes by the Editor, and an Appendix, containing a Review of the Controversy, Lon., 1815, 8vo.

"The tracts which he published in controversy with Dr. Priestley are written with consummate ability, and demonstrate the literary deficiencies of his bold antagonist."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"In his controversy with Dr. Priestley, Bishop Horsley had a manifest advantage (as is now pretty generally acknowledged) both in learning and argument."—Edin. Rev., xvii, 467, q. v.

"The severest castigation which a rash and arrogant invader of another's province ever received."

"Horsley's productions in this controversy will be read as standard works, and admired as models of clear and powerful reasoning. They show a strong and energetic mind, rich in various learning, trained in logical precision, quick in perceiving the fallacies of his opponent and skilful in refuting them."—Lon. Quar. Rev., iii, 396-400, q. v.

"Horsley was the militant of the last generation, Herbert Marsh of the present."—Sunday's Life and Correspond.

Apollonii Pergæi Inconclusionum, libri duo Restituti, Oxf., 1770, 4to.

5. Complete Edition of the Works of Sir Isaac Newton, under the title of Isaac Newtoni Opera quæ extant omnia Commentariis, Illustrat Samuel Horsley, LL.D., 1779-85, 5 vols. 4to.

"A work requiring the exertion of uncommon talents, and accompanied with difficulties which Dr. Horsley was by no means prepared to overcome. Indeed, we know of no literary project, even in this day of literary adventure, of which the failure has been more complete."—PROFESSOR PLAYFAIR: Edin. Rev., iv, 258-259.

"A work full of erudition, and much esteemed."—Walt's Bibl. Brit.

"In chemical acquirements, and in a critical knowledge of the languages in which the sacred books were originally written, he stood in the very first rank of excellence."—Edin. Rev., xvii, 466.

7. Critical Disquisitions on the 18th Chapter of Isaiah; in a Letter to Edward King, Esq., 1796, 1801, 4to. Also in Biblical Criticism, i. 238. 8. Hoses; trans. from the Hebrew, with Notes, Explan., and Crit., 1801, 4to; 1804, 4to. Also in Biblical Criticism, with the exception of the serm. on 1 Pet. iii., which is in the ed. of 1804.

"This is one of the ablest pieces of criticism on a portion of Scripture in the English language. The preface is admirably written, and contains the soundest principles of Biblical interpretation, as well as excellent views of the particular book to which it is prefixed. The version is nervous, and often characteristic of the translator's mind, as well as of the prophet's style. The critical notes display great knowledge of Hebrew, though occasionally they discover that Horsley was partial to novelty and paradox, and in some degree influenced by his Hutchinsonian predilections. Few books are more worthy of the attention of the Biblical scholar."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"The preface contains a treasure of Biblical criticism."—Horn's Bibl. Bib.

"Critical and Illustrative."—Bickersteth's C. P.

"This translation, with its notes, forms a most valuable accession to sound learning; and evinces at once the best qualities of the scholar and the divine, supported by sagacity and a powerful judgment."—British Critic, O. S., xix, 178.

But Nos. 10 and 11 are reviewed with considerable severity by Professor Playfair, in Edin. Rev., iv, 257-272. In fact, the ostentatious preface of the bishop aroused vigilance and sharpened criticism. 12. A Critical Essay on Virgil's Two Seasons of Honey, and his Seasons of Sowing Wheat, &c., Lon., 1805, 4to. See No. 6. 13. Sermons, Dundee, 3 vols. 8vo: i. and ii., 1810; iii., 1812; vol. ii., 3d ed., 1812; iii., 2d ed., 1813. To these is to be added a 4th vol., Lon., 1815, 8vo, containing 9 Sermons on our Lord's Resurrection, and a Dissert. on the Prophecies of the Messiah, &c. The above vols. were repub. in 2 vols. in 1824, and again in 1829, (including the nine sermons on the Resurrection, and the Dissert. on the Prophecies of the Messiah, &c.; 3d ed., Lon., 1832, 8vo;) in all, 4 vols. in 2. This last ed., 1829, 2 vols. 8vo, is the first complete ed. of Horsley's Sermons; again, 1843, 8vo; 1847, 8vo; and in collective ed. of his Theolog. Works, 1845, (vide post.)

"His sermons are fine specimens of commanding eloquence, and contain many deep and original views of Scripture facts and prophecies."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"Much original, deep, devout, and evangelical matter, with much that is bold, hazardous, speculative, and rash. . . Bishop Horsley's powers of mind were of a high order; and his sermons and his other works will render assistance to the student chiefly in the way of criticism. He had the integrity and candour to speak decidedly against the ignorance of many who opposed what they called Calvinistic views."—Bickersteth's C. P.

"Ordinary readers, moderately conversant with the Bible, and with the theory and practice of their religion, may derive more advantage from these discourses than from any volumes of sermons which have issued from the press for the last fifty years."—Edin. Rev.

"With very few exceptions, of the critical and explanatory sort, consisting of disquisitions on points of abstruse and difficult investigation. They are not suited to the taste of general readers, but adapted almost exclusively to those 'whose stomachs,' to use the author's own expression, 'are qualified for the digestion of strong meats,' and whose turn of mind has habituated them to critical discussion and inquiry: We perceive, in almost every part, the mind of Horsley at work."—Lon. Quar. Rev., (on vol. i. and ii., 1810), iii, 396-407, q. v.

"They are compositions sui generis. Never perhaps did philosophy, certainly never did the philosophy of physics, lend more powerful aid to the cause of revelation."—Ibid., (on vol. i.-iii., 1810-12), ix, 30-36, q. v.

"In the sense in which we have now explained that term, every discourse in the volumes before us [i. and ii., 1810] may justly be denominated a gospel sermon."—Edin. Rev., xvii, 465-466, q. v.

"We have indeed no hesitation whatever to say, that no such sermons have issued from the British press since the commencement of our critical labours."—British Critic.

16. The Book of Psalms; trans. from the Hebrew, with Notes, Crit. and Explan., 1815, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1833, 8vo; 4th ed., 1845, 8vo, in collective ed., (vide post.)

"This is a posthumous work, and far inferior in merit and importance to the former, [Horsley: see No. 8.] Not above half the Psalms are translated. On the greater number there are no notes, and these for the most part are short and imperfect. Most of the Psalms the bishop applies to the Messiah, in which he merely follows the doctrine of Hutchinson. As Horsley never wrote what did not deserve to be read, even his fragments and hints are calculated to be of service to the student of the Bible; though such a work as this on the Psalms would never have been published by the learned prelate himself."—*Orme's Bibl. "The remarks made on the Psalms [see No. 16] are quite as applicable to all that is in these volumes. As a critic, Horsley was learned, but dogmatic. Stern, bold, clear, and brilliant, often eloquent, sometimes argumentative, always original, he was too often led, by his disdain of what is common, into hazardous speculations and hasty conclusions, and not unfrequently into confident assertions of dubious and paradoxical points."—*Orme's Bibl. "Several of his critical works are posthumous, and appear in an unfinished state; but even these bear the impress of his mind, and are not unworthy of his great powers."—Williams's C. P.

"Chiefly posthumous, and many things that probably the author would not have published; much original and useful thought."—Bickerstaff's C. E.

Hoskins, or Hoskyns, John, Sr., d. 1638, a native of Herefordshire, educated at, and Fellow of, New Coll., Oxf., became a Sergeant-at-Law, a Justice-Itinerant for Wales, and one of the Council of Marches. He was the author of a number of epigrams and epitaphs in Latin and English, pub. in several collections; a work entitled The Art of Memory; and left in MS. some law-treatises, and an unfinished Greek Lexicon. See Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon., ii. 624-629; Granger's Biog. Hist. of Eng. He was eminent for his skill in Latin and English poetry.

Hosmer, William Henry Cuyler, b. 1814, at Avon, Western New York, was educated at the Temple Hill Academy at Genesee, and at Geneva College. He was engaged in the practice of the law at Avon until 1854, when he removed to the city of New York, where he holds an office in the Custom-House.

Mr. Hosmer became an author at a very early age,—his muse finding congenial themes in the legends, customs, and superstitions of the North American Indians, with which he was familiar from his childhood. The following chronological list of his productions is extracted from a work to which (as to the other vols. by the same author) the student of American Letters must have frequent reference,—Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America:

"In 1830 he composed a drama entitled 'The Hall of Tecumseh.' His first publication, except contributions to the journals and magazines, was 'The Themes of Song,' containing about six hundred and fifty lines; this appeared in 1834, and was followed by 'The Pioneers of Western New York,' in 1838; 'The Prospects of the Age,' in 1841; 'Yonondio, or The Warriors of the Genesee,' in 1844; 'The Months,' in 1847; 'Bird Notes,' 'Legends of the Senecas,' and 'Indian Traditions and Songs,' in 1850; and a complete edition of his 'Poetical Works,' in two volumes, in 1853."

Dr. Griswold commends Mr. Hosmer's poetry in very high terms. After some eulogistic comments upon "the longest, if not the most important, of his productions," the critic continues:

"To such poems, however, [those relating to the Indians,] most readers will be apt to prefer the simpler effusions in which he has echoed the Notes of the Birds, or painted the varying phenomena of The Months. In these, too, he has faithfully subjected his muse to the requirements of truth. He accomplishes his task of description by felicities in selection and combination from nature. An AUDUBON or a MICHAUX would search in vain for an error in his plumage or foliage, and a COLA might give the finishing touches to the lights and shadows of his landscapes, from the poet's observation of atmospheric effects or the changing influence of the seasons." This is an authentic and a most valuable work. In the Appendix will be found The Acts and Decrees of the Synod of Diamper, &c.

Hough, John, D.D., 1651-1743, a native of Middlesex, educated at, and Fellow of, Magdalene College, Oxford, was elected President of his college in 1687, in contempt of the arbitrary mandamus of James II., who illegally attempted to force the Fellows to elect Anthony Farmer head of the college. The king hereupon sent a mandate to the Fellows to elect Dr. Samuel Parker, Bishop of Oxford, a Roman Catholic, President of the college. Upon the refusal of the Fellows, Lords-Commissioners were sent to Magdalene, who were stoutly confronted by Hough and twenty-six of the twenty-eight Fellows of the College, and the keys retained by the former, who boldly protested against the illegal proceedings. The Commissioners then forced open the door of the President's lodgings, and placed Dr. Parker in Hough's place.

"The nation, as well as the university, looked on all this proceeding with just indignation. It was thought an open piece of robbery and burglary, when men authorized by no legal commission came forcibly and turned men out of their possession and freeholds."—BURTON BURRIS.

"Hough maintained his own rights and those of his college with equal decorum and firmness."—Sir James Mackintosh's Review of the Causes of the Revolution of 1688: Works, II. 157, Lon., 1844.

"The protest of Hough was everywhere applauded; the forcing of his door was everywhere mentioned with abhorrence."—T. B. Macaulay's Hist. of Eng., vol. II., 1849.

This occurred in October, 1687; and in the end of September of the following year, James II.—now alarmed for the safety of his crown—took measures by which Hough and his expelled Fellows and Demies were restored. After the Revolution, Hough was, in April, 1690, made Bishop of Oxford; in 1699 he succeeded Dr. William Lloyd, Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry; in 1715, on the death of Tenison, he declined the Archbishopric of Canterbury, but in 1717 he became Bishop of Worcester. For further information respecting this excellent man, the reader is referred to the histories of England; John E. Wilmot's Life and Correspondence of Bishop Hough, Lon., 1812, r. 4to; and to the Life prefixed to Bishop Hough's Sermons and Charges, by Wm. Russell, Oxford, 1821, 8vo. During the bishop's life he pub. eight occasional sermons, 1701, '02, '04, '05, '09, '12, '15, all in 4to. Mr. Russell's collection contains four charges and nine sermons, but neither of the above sermons, at which we somewhat marvel. Hough left strict orders that none of his MS. sermons should be pub. after his death.

"He is furnished with a large stock of learning and piety. He has turned over the Fathers with great curiosity and pains, and paid a veneration respect to their ashes; and, as he is a Prelate of remarkable piety and learning, so he is a Hero of great temper and courage. This was seen in his resolute defending the rights of Magdalene College: for this noble service he is justly rewarded with the See of Lichfield and Coventry. Those whose actions are eminently pious and brave will, like this worthy champion, be eminent in place and person."—JOHN DUNTON: Life and Errors.

Hoveden, Roger De, an English historian, lawyer, and divine, temp. Henry II., flourished about the end of the 12th and beginning of the 13th centuries. He was for some time a Professor of History at Oxford; but a portion of his life was spent at court, and in confidential services intrusted to him by the king. He composed Annales in Latin, commencing at the year 731, where Bede left off, and continued to the third year of King John, 1202. The Annales were first pub. by Sir Henry Savile, in the Scriptores post Bedam, Lon., 1595, fol., and reprinted at Frankfurt, in two books, 1601, fol. A new ed., by T. Riley, pub. in Bohn's Antiq. Lib., vols. xx., xxiii., 1863. Vossius says that he wrote also a history of the Northumbrian kings, and a life of Thomas à Becket.

"If we consider his diligence, his knowledge of antiquity, and his religious strictness of veracity, he may be considered as having surpassed not only the rude historians of the preceding ages, but even what could have been expected of himself. If to that fidelity, which is the first quality of a historian, he had joined a little more elegance of Latin style, he might have stood the first among the authors of that class."—Leland.

Howard, Henry, Earl of Surrey, 1518?-1547, one of the most eminent of English poets, was the third son of Thomas, Earl of Surrey, and third Duke of Norfolk, by his second duchess, Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Stafford, Duke of Buckingham. In his early youth he was a companion at Windsor Castle to Henry Fitzroy,

Duke of Richmond, Henry VIII's natural son; and he subsequently accompanied his friend to Cardinal College, now Christ Church, Oxford. In 1536 he was married to the Lady Frances Vere, in 1542 served in the army under his father in Scotland, and in 1544 was appointed Field-Marshal of the English army on the Continent. He did good service at the sieges of Landreay and Boulogne, and, by his valour, skill, and accomplishments, secured a degree of popular favour which excited the jealousy of the king and the Earl of Hertford, the king's brother, and thus proved his ruin. In 1546 he was ordered to return from the Continent, made a prisoner on his arrival in England, convicted of high treason on the most absurd pretences, and beheaded on Tower Hill, January 19, 1547. He left two sons and three daughters to mourn his untimely and melancholy end. Much obscurity rests upon his adventures as a romantic traveller and poetical lover, and until recently but little was known of the far-famed lady to whom he indited the most celebrated of his effusions; but "It seems to be now ascertained, after sweeping away a host of foolish legends and traditional prejudices, that the Geraldine of Surrey, Lady Elizabeth Fitzgerald, was a child of thirteen, for whom his passion, if such it is to be called, began several years after his own marriage. But, in fact, there is more of the conventional tone of amorous song than of real emotion in Surrey's poetry. The are not like the deep sorrows of Petrarch or the fiery transports of the Castilians."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, i. 420.

The passion, if such we are to call it, for "The Fair Geraldine" commenced in 1541, or six years after his marriage to Lady Frances Vere. Geraldine, the daughter of Gerald Fitzgerald, Earl of Kildare, (most probably the Lady Elizabeth,) was born in 1528. She became the third wife of Edward Clinton, Earl of Lincoln. Those who desire to enter more deeply into this subject and the details of our noble author's life, and the characteristics of his poetry, will find ample materials for their investigations in the authorities cited in the course of this article. 1. The Songes and Sonnettes of Henry, Earle of Surrey, and others, (Sir Thomas Wyatt, &c.,) were printed (1st edit.) by R. Reprinted by Baron Bolland, for the Roxburgh Club, 1814, 4to. The "strange metre" is nothing else than blank verse.

"This is the first composition in blank verse extant in the English language. Nor has it merely the relative and accidental merit of being a curiosity. It is executed with great fidelity, yet not with a promisc servility. The diction is often poetical, and the verification varied with proper pauses. . . . It seems probable that his active situations of life prevented him from completing a design of translating the whole Æneid."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ed. 1840, iii. 36.

"Surrey is the first who introduced blank verse into our English poetry. . . . The translation by Surrey of the second book of the Æneid, in blank verse, is among the chief of his productions. No one had, before his time, known how to translate or imitate with appropriate expression. But the structure of his verse is not very harmonious, and the sense is rarely carried beyond the line. If we could rely on a theory advanced and ably supported by his editor, [Dr. Nott,] Surrey deserves the still more conspicuous praise of having brought about a great revolution in our poetical numbers."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1844, i. 437, q. v.

And see our life of NICHOLAS GRIMBOLD, in this Dictionary, p. 743; and authorities cited in the course of this article. To refer to these authorities is the more necessary from the fact that our narrow limits warn us that we must not linger on so tempting a theme. But a few lines of quotation of opinions respecting the illustrious subject of our notice we are not willing to dispense with.

We should not omit to record the fact that Surrey's translations of some of the Psalms and of Ecclesiastes into English verse, and a few additional original poems, were printed by Dr. Percy, but destroyed in the fire at Nichols's office, Feb. 1808. Surrey was the author of many other English poetical compositions, never pub., several of which are now lost.

"John Clerc has mentioned, with the highest commendations, many translations done by Surrey from the Latin, Italian, French, and Spanish languages. But these, it is probable, were nothing more than juvenile exercises." See Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ed. 1840.

"We now emerge from the twilight of learning to an almost classic author, that ornament of a boisterous yet not unpolished court, the Earl of Surrey, celebrated by Drayton, Dryden, Fenton, and Pope, illustrated by his own muse, and lamented for his unhappy and unmerited death; 'a man,' as Sir Walter Raleigh says, 'no less valiant than learned, and of excellent hopes.'"—HORACE WALPOLE: Park's ed., 1806, i. 265.

To the eulogists of Surrey, Park adds the names of Leiland, Ascham, Tuberville, Churchyard, Sir Philip Sidney, Webbe, Puttenham, Meres, Harvey, Whitney, Drayton, Bolton, Peacham, Dryden, Lodge, Brydges, Ellis, Anderson, Warton, and Henry. The list could be enlarged if it were requisite.

"The character of Henry, Earl of Surrey, reflects splendour even upon the name of Howard. . . . He revived, in an age too rude to enjoy fully those beauties which mere nature could not but in some degree relish, the force of expression, the polished style, and the passionate sentiments, of the best poets of antiquity."—LONDON: Biog. Accounts of the Holbein Portraits.

"Surrey, for his justness of thought, correctness of style, and purity of expression, may justly be pronounced the first English classical poet. He unquestionably is the first polite writer of love-verses in our language. It must, however, be allowed that there is a striking native beauty in some of our love-verses written much earlier than Surrey's. But in the most savage age and countries rude nature has taught elegance to the lover. . . . Surrey's talents, which are commonly supposed to have been confined to sentiment and amorous lamentation, were adapted to descriptive poetry and the representations of rural imagery. . . . Surrey is said, by the ingenious author [editor] of the MUSE'S LIBRARY, to have been the first who broke through the fashion of stanzas and wrote in the heroic couplet. But all Surrey's poems are in the alternate rhyme; nor, had this been true, is the other position to be granted. Chaucer's Prologues and most of the Canterbury Tales are written in long verse: nor was the use of the couplet resumed till late in the reign of Elizabeth. . . . In the sonnets of Surrey we are surprised to find nothing of that metaphysical cast which marks the Italian poets, his supposed masters, especially Petrarch. Surrey's sentiments are for the most part natural and unaffected; arising from his own feelings, and dictated by the present circumstances. His poetry is alike unembarrassed by learned allusions or elaborate conceits. If our author copies Petrarch, it is Petrarch's better manner: when he descends from his Platonic abstractions, his refinements of passion, his exaggerated compliments, and his play upon opposite sentiments, into a track of tenderness, simplicity, and nature. Petrarch would have been a better poet had he been a worse scholar. Our author's mind was not too much overlaid by learning."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ed. 1840, iii. 29, 30, 33, 41.

Dr. Nott's comparison between Wyatt and Surrey, in the Dissertation prefixed to the 2d vol. of his ed. of Wyatt and Surrey, (vide ante), is well worth perusal, but the work of which it forms a portion can rarely be had. The reader, however, will find an extract from this Dissertation in Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, i. 425-426. The last-named eminent authority remarks of Surrey:

"The taste of this accomplished man is more striking than his poetical genius. He did much for his own country and his native language. The verification of Surrey differs very considerably from that of his predecessors. He introduced, as Dr. Nott says, a sort of involution into his style, which gives an air of dignity and remoteness from common life. It was, in fact, borrowed from the license of Italian poetry, which our own idiom has rejected. He avoids pedantic words forcibly obtruded from the Latin, of which our earlier poets, both English and Scots, had been ridiculously fond. The absurd epithets of Hoccleve, Lydgate, Dunbar, and Douglas, are applied equally to the most different things, as to show that they annexed no meaning to them. Surrey rarely lays an unnatural stress on final syllables, merely as such, which they would not receive in ordinary pronunciation; another usual trick of the school of Chaucer. His words are well chosen and well arranged."—Ida supra, i. 423-427.

The influence of Surrey and Wyatt's poetry upon the taste of his age was by no means so extensive as we might reasonably imagine it would have been:

"The graces of the Italian muse, which had been taught by Surrey and Wyatt, were confined to a few. . . . Although Lord Surrey and some others had so far deviated from the dulness of the times as to copy the Italian poets, the same taste does not seem to have uniformly influenced all the nobility of the court of King Henry the Eighth who were fond of writing verses."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ed. 1840, iii. 72, 83-84, q. v., with the authors referred to in the text and notes.

Howard, Henry, Earl of Northampton, 1539?-1614, second son of the preceding, was most unworthy of his illustrious parentage; in proof of which it is enough to mention his complicity with the infamous match of his great-niece, the Countess of Essex, with Carr, Viscount Rochester, and his share in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury. He was educated at King's College and at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where, says Bishop Godwin, he was esteemed "the learnedest amongst the nobility, and the most noble amongst the learned." Of his "learning" there seems to be but little doubt: his "nobility," however, cannot be so readily allowed. He left in MS., An Apology for the Government of Woman, Forms of Prayer, &c., and pub. the following very curious work:—A Defensive against the Poysen of supposed Prophecies, Lon., 1583, 4to; 1620, fol. Of this vol., dedicated to Sir Francis Walsingham, which principally relates to expositions of Judicial Astrology, Dreams, Oracles, Conferences with Familiars or Damned Spirits, &c., a copious analysis will be found in Oldys's British Librarian, 331-343. Howard, John, 1726-1790, the eminent philanthropist, whose name will in all ages be held in reverent esteem, was a native of Hackney, London, the son of a wealthy tradesman, and the inheritor of a large fortune. In 1777 he visited every prison in the United Kingdom, and pub. the results of his investigations in the same year, in a vol. entitled The State of the Prisons in England and Wales, &c., Warrington, 4to. Appendix, 1780, 4to; 2d ed. of the whole, 1780, 8vo; 3d ed., 1784, 4to; 4th ed., 1786, 4to; Lon., 1792, 4to. In 1780 he pub. a trans. of a French Account of the Bastille; and in 1789 the Duke of Tuscany's New Code of Civil Law, with an English trans. The deplorable condition of the prisons at home excited a determination to visit those of foreign countries, with the hope of benefit to the miserable inmates; and faithfully did this good man carry out his praiseworthy enterprise. A detail of his labours does not, of course, enter into the plan of a work of this character; but it is only proper that we should direct the reader to the best sources of information respecting a philanthropist whose praise was in every one's mouth, from the rough benediction of the illiterate convict to the splendid eulogy of the greatest orator of modern Europe. He died at Kherson, South Russia, January 20, 1790, of a malignant fever, caught during a visit to a young lady for whom the benefit of his counsel had been invoked. He was buried with distinguished honours by the Russian authorities, and his death excited a profound sensation throughout the civilized world. A monumental statue to his memory, by Bacon, was erected in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Howard pub. in 1789, 4to, (2d ed., 1791, 4to.), An Account of the principal Lazarettos in Europe, with various Papers relative to the Plague, &c.; and contributed a paper on the Heat of the Waters at Bath to Phil. Trans., 1767, and another on the Heat of the Ground on Mt. Vesuvius, to Phil. Trans., 1771. We need hardly remark, in conclusion, that the influence of Christianity was the great moving-power which sent John Howard from the pleasant home and lovely scenery in which he so greatly delighted to visit the cheerless cells of the miserable, the neglected, and the forsaken of earth. The barren creed of infidelity enforces no such duties, seeks no such honours, and submits to no such sacrifices. Yet this Apostle of Humanity understood too well the spirit of the Gospel of Christ to suppose that even his labours—abundant and self-sacrificing as they were—could do ought to procure remission of sin or purchase acceptance with his Maker:

"My immortal spirit," says he, "I cast on the sovereign mercy of God, through Jesus Christ, who is the Lord, my strength and my song, and, I trust, has become my salvation. My desire is to be washed and cleansed, and justified, in the blood of Christ, and to dedicate myself to that Saviour who has bought us with a price."

We have had occasion to record in this volume memoirs of many of the mighty, many of the noble, of the illustrious name of Howard; but this one "excelleth them all."

Howard, Sir Robert, M.P., 1626-1698, a younger son of Thomas, Earl of Berkshire, and brother of Edward Howard and James Howard, (ante), educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge, was a warm adherent of Charles I., and at the Restoration was rewarded for his services by being knighted and made Auditor of the Exchequer. Howe, John, 1630-1705, an eminent Non-conformist divine, son of the minister of Loughborough, Leicestershire, was educated at Christ Coll., Cambridge, became Fellow of Magdalene Coll., Oxf., subsequently minister of Great Torrington, Devonshire, and domestic chaplain to Oliver Cromwell, and afterwards to Richard Cromwell; ejected for Non-conformity, 1662; chaplain to Lord Massarene, in Ireland, where he was permitted to preach, 1671 to 1675; chosen minister of the late Dr. Lazarus Seaman's congregation in London, 1675; visited the Continent with Lord Wharton in 1685; returned to London in 1687; and continued to labour among his old congregation until his death, which occurred April 2, 1705. He was a man of profound learning, eminent piety, and unwearied zeal. He was the author of many sermons and theological treatises, which have always been held in the highest estimation. A collective edit. of the works which he pub. in his lifetime, accompanied by a Life of the author by Dr. Edmund Calamy, appeared in 1724, 2 vols. fol.; repub. in 1848, 3 vols. 8vo, £1 7s., edited by Rev. J. P. Hewlett. Two vols. of Serms. were pub. in 1744,

2 vols. 8vo. Howe's Whole Works, edited by Rev. John Hunt, of Chichester, were pub. in 1810-22, 8 vols. r. 8vo. This ed. contains—I. vols. i-iv., the contents of the 2 fol. vols. of 1724; II. vols. v-vi., his Posthumous Works, being 78 Serms. and a portion of Pt. 1 of the Principles of the Oracles of God; III. vols. vii-viii., new matter never before pub. This ed. was pub. at £3 3s.; large paper, r. 8vo, £4 4s. Contents, with the Life by Calamy, repub., 1832, imp. 8vo, pp. 1278, £2 2s.; again in 1835, imp. 8vo, £1 10s. A new ed., to be comprised in 9 vols. 8vo, has been recently (in May, 1856) announced as in preparation by Messrs. Johnstone and Hunter, of Edinburgh. There have also been new edits. of separate treatises of this author, edited by Noel Gordon, &c.; a Selection from his Works and Sketch of his Life, by Rev. W. Wilson, D.D., 1827, 2 vols. 18mo; Select Treatises, with a Memoir by Thos. Taylor, 1835, 12mo; a selection entitled Christian Theology, by John Howe, selected and systematically arranged, with a Life, by Samuel Dunn, 1836, 12mo; and a Life and Character of Howe, by H. Rogers. Howe's best-known works are The Living Temple; The Blessedness of the Righteous; Of Delighting in God; The Redeemer's Tears; Enmity and Reconciliation; The Redeemer's Dominion over the Invisibile World; The Office and Work of the Holy Spirit; God's Prescience; The Vanity of this Mortal Life. There are but few theological authors recorded in our Dictionary whose writings have been so enthusiastically commended as those of John Howe.

"He seems to have understood the gospel as well as any unimpaired writer, and to have imbibed as much of its spirit. There is the truest sublimity to be found in his writings, and some of the strongest pathos; yet, often obscure, generally harsh, he has imitated the worst parts of Boyle's style. He has a vast number and variety of uncommon thoughts, and is, on the whole, one of the most valuable writers in our language, or, I believe, in the world."—Dr. Dodshead.

"Possessed of the learning of Gudworth, the evangelical piety of Owen, and the fervour of Baxter, with a mind of larger dimensions than what belonged to any of these distinguished individuals, every thing which fell from his pen is worthy of immortality. He delights while he instructs, and impresses while he enlightens. His Living Temple, The Blessedness of the Righteous, Of Delighting in God, The Redeemer's Tears, are among the finest productions of uninspired genius, and must be read with high gratification by every Christian. His style is occasionally rugged and inharmonious; but the sentiment will richly repay the trifling annoyances of its harsh and involved structure."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

"For depth and originality of thought, John Howe has never been surpassed by any theological writer whatever. His principles were strictly evangelical, and his spirit eminently catholic and devout. His Living Temple, especially, is a masterpiece of profound argumentation. . . . His best pieces are The Blessedness of the Righteous, Delighting in God, Enmity and Reconciliation, Redeemer's Tears, and Dominion. Some Funeral Sermons, and part of his Living Temple, are most excellent."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"Mr. Howe, nervous and majestic, with all the powers of imagery at his command."—JAMES HEAVY.

"A very extraordinary, original, sublime, and splendid writer, but sometimes obscure and heavy. Few writers will more strengthen and enlarge the reader's mind; but he is deficient in evangelical statement and simplicity."—Baker's Hist. C. A.

"Perhaps it may be considered as no unfair test of intellectual and spiritual excellence that a person can relish the writings of John Howe: if he does not, he may have reason to suspect that something in the head or heart is wrong. A young minister who wishes to attain eminence in his profession, if he has not the works of John Howe, and can procure them in no other way, should sell his coat and buy them; and, if that will not suffice, let him sell his bed and lie on the floor; and if he spend his days in reading them he will not complain that he lies hard at night. . . . The Blessedness of the Righteous is a first-rate performance, and contains a vast extent of thought, of learning, but especially of piety. . . . A Treatise of Delighting in God is one of the finest pieces of practical theology to be found in the English language."—Boyes and Bennett's Hist. of Dissenters.

"One of the most learned and polite writers among the dissenters. His reading in divinity was very extensive: he was a good Orientalist, and understood several of the modern languages. . . . His Blessedness of the Righteous was the most generally esteemed of his performances. He was an admired preacher, but was sometimes too profound for ordinary capacities. There is an uncommon depth of thought in several of his works."—Granger's Biog. Hist. of Eng.

"None can peruse his writings without feeling that his mind was habitually filled with the contemplation of that peculiar but truly divine character, that comprehensiveness and all-pervading excellence, the ultimate development of which, in those who embrace Christianity, is the design of the mysteries it reveals, and of all the powerful motives by which it prompts to action."—Rogers's Life of Howe.

"Nothing in the language can equal, as a whole, Howe's Living Temple; but his Blessedness of the Righteous is one of my favourite pieces. I read it again and again with renewed interest and delight."—WILLIAM JAY.

The critical opinion of Robert Hall is always too valuable to be omitted where it can at all be crowded in; and, though want of room prevents us from citing other comments before us, the verdict of so eminent an authority must not be denied. It occurs in the memoranda of a conversation between Mr. Hall and the Rev. Robert Balmer, of Berwick-upon-Tweed:

"B. 'May I ask, sir, what writers you would most recommend to a young minister?' H. 'Why, sir, I feel very incompetent to give directions on that head: I can only say that I have learned far more from John Howe than from any other author I ever read. There is an astonishing magnificence in his conceptions. He had not the same perception of the beautiful as of the sublime; and hence his endless subdivisions.' B. 'That was the fault of his age.' H. 'In part, sir; but he has more of it than many of the writers of that period; than Barrow, for example, who was somewhat earlier. There was, I think, an innate inaptitude in Howe's mind for discerning minute graces and proprieties, and hence his sentences are often long and cumbersome. Still, he was unquestionably the greatest of the Puritan divines.'

"After adverting to several of Howe's works, Mr. H. said, in reference to his Blessedness of the Righteous, 'Perhaps Baxter's Saint's Rest is fitted to make a deeper impression on the majority of readers. Baxter enforces a particular idea with extraordinary clearness, force, and earnestness. His appeals to the conscience are irresistible. Howe, again, is distinguished by calmness, self-possession, majesty, and comprehensiveness; and for my own part, I decidedly prefer him to Baxter. I admire, exceedingly, his Living Temple, his sermon on the Redeemer's Tears, &c.; but, in my opinion, the best thing he ever wrote is his defence of the sincerity of the Gospel offer. I refer to the treatise called the Reconcilableness of God's Providence of the Sins of Men with the Wisdom and Sincerity of his Counsels, Exhortations, and whatever other [whatsoever] means he uses to prevent them. This I regard as the most profound, the most philosophical, and the most valuable of all Howe's writings.'—Hall's Works, ed. Lon., 1853; Memoir, vi. 120.

Howe, John, M.P., d. 1721, a relation of Charles Howe, (ante), and a statesman of note, was the author of A Panegyric on King William, and of several songs and little poems. He is introduced in Swift's ballad On The Game of Traffic. See Nichols's Poems; Collins's Peerage.

Howe, Joseph, a lineal descendant of the celebrated Puritan divine, John Howe, a well-known statesman, now Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia, attained considerable reputation as the editor of The Nova Scotian, a newspaper of wide circulation.

Howe, Josiah, d. 1701, a divine and poet, Fellow of Trin. Coll., Ox., preached in 1644 a sermon before Charles I., of which thirty copies were printed in red letters. A copy, the only one known, is in the Bodleian Library. He was the author of a set of recommendatory English verses prefixed to the folio edit. of Beaumont and Fletcher; of another before Randolph's Poems, 1640; of another before Cartwright's Comedies and Poems, 1651.

"These pieces," says Warton, "which are in the witty epigrammatic style that then prevailed, have uncommon acuteness, and highly deserve to be revived."

Howell, Elizabeth, widow of Robert Howell, of Philadelphia, and a native and resident of that city, better known by her maiden name,—Miss Lloyd,—has gained considerable celebrity by her poem entitled Milton's Prayer of Patience. These verses, originally pub. anonymously in The Friends' Review for January, 1848, were subsequently pub. as Milton's in an English edit. of his works. They have frequently appeared in periodicals under the title of Milton on his Loss of Sight. It is hardly necessary to state that they possess an uncommon degree of merit. They will be found in T. Buchanan Read's Female Poets of America, 6th ed., Phila., 1855. Mrs. Howell also contributed several poems to The Wheat Sheaf, a collection of Prose and Poetry, Phila., 1852; 3d ed., 1857.

Howell, James, 1594–1666, educated at, and Fellow of, Jesus College, Oxford, was the son of Thomas Hall, minister of Abernethy in Caermarthenshire. From 1619 he travelled in Holland, Flanders, Spain, France, and Italy, as steward to a glass-ware manufactory, and was subsequently employed abroad and at home on public business, and in 1640 made Clerk of the Council. In 1643 he was committed to the Fleet Prison by order of Parliament, and remained there, writing and translating books, until some time after the murder of Charles I. At the Restoration his sufferings in the cause of loyalty were rewarded by the post of Historiographer-Royal of England, which place was created for his benefit and retained by him until his death. He was a man of learning and humour, and versed in the modern languages. "Thank God," he says, "I have this fruit of my foreign travels, that I can pray unto Him every day of the week in a separate language, and upon Sunday in seven." As a writer, although he was the author of forty-one original works,—historical, political, poetical, and philological,—and the translator of four from the Italian, one from the French, and one from the Spanish, all but his Familiar Letters may be said to be unknown to ordinary readers. We notice a few of his publications:—1. Dendrologia; or, the Vocall Forest, Lon., 1640, fol.; 2d ed., 1644, 4to; Camb., 1645, 12mo; 3d ed., pub. under the title of ΑΕΝΑΡΟΔΟΓΙΑ—Dodona's Grove; or, the Vocall Forest. Pub. with two other tracts, viz.: Parables reflecting upon the Times, and England's Tears for the Present Wars, 1645; 2d Part of Dodona's Grove, 1650, 8vo. In French, 1st Part, Paris, 1641, 4to; 2d Part, Paris, 1652, 4to. In Latin, 1st Part, Lon., 1640, 8vo.

"This is a strange allegory, without any ingenuity in maintaining the analogy between the outer and the inner story, which alone can give a reader any pleasure in allegorical writing. The subject is the state of Europe, especially of England, about 1640, under the guise of animated trees in a forest. . . . The contrivance is all along so clumsy and unintelligible, the invention so poor and absurd, the story—if story there be—so dull an echo of well-known events, that it is impossible to reckon Dodona's Grove any thing but an entire failure. Howell has no wit, but he has abundance of conceits, flat and commonplace enough. With all this, he was a man of some sense and observation."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1864; iii. 109.

Mr. Hallam suggests with much plausibility that Harrington's Oceana, pub. in 1656, was "Partly suggested, perhaps, by the Dodona's Grove of Howell, or by Barclay's Argonauta, and by a few other fictions of the preceding age."—Ibid. supra, p. 438. See Censura Literaria.

"Something is to be had from Howell still. It is agreeable, if not useful, to know what a traveller was in the days of James and Charles."—Lon. Retrospect. Rev., xiii. 18-30, 1826. This review contains copious quotations.

3. Epistolæ Ho-Elizianæ; or, Familiar Letters, Domestic and Foreign: divided into sundry Sections, partly Historical, partly Political, partly Philosophical, upon emergent Occasions, 1645, 4to. Another vol. in 1647; both these, with the addit. of a third, in 1650, 3 vols. 8vo; 4th vol., 1655, 8vo; 11th ed., 1754, 8vo. Since several times reprinted. These Letters, addressed to James I., to several Lords and Bishops, Sir Kenelm Digby, Sir Rob. Napier, Ben Jonson, and others, contain many curious particulars relating to the reigns of James I. and Charles I.

"Many of the said letters were never written before the author of them was in the Fleet, as he pretended they were, only feigned, (no time being kept with their dates,) and purposely published to gain time to relieve his necessities, yet give a tolerable history of those times."—Athen. Oxon., Bliss's ed., iii. 746-747.

Dr. Bliss gives a table of the edits. of Howell's Letters, and announces his intention of publishing a new and corrected edit., with notes and an appendix, for which he had long been making the necessary collections. It is to be greatly regretted that it was never given to the world. The table of edits. is as follows:—1. 1647; 2. 1647; 3. 1650; 4. 1655; 5. 1673; 6. 1688; 7. 1708; 9. 1726; 10. 1737; 11. 1754. The ed. of 1737 has the reputation of being the best.

"I believe the second published correspondence of this kind, and, in our own language at least, of any importance after Hall, [see HALL, JOSEPH, D.D.] will be found to be Epistolæ Ho-Elizianæ, or the Letters of James Howell, a great traveller, an intimate friend of Jonson, and the first who bore the office of the royal historiographer, which discover a variety of literature, and abound with much entertaining and useful information."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet., ed. 1840, iii. 440-441.

"Howell is a wit who, in writing his own history, has written that of his own times; he is one of the few whose genius, striking in the heat of the moment only current coin, produce finished metal for the cabinet. His letters are still published."—Disraeli's Literary Miscellanies, ed. 1840, p. 46.

"These letters were written in England, but are not the coinage of British soil. They are amusing and instructive, and have deservedly gone through half a score of editions. The account in them of the assassination of Henry IV. of France is minutely curious."—Deakin's Lib. Comp.

"His letters are entertaining."—HALLAM: ubi supra.
 "If there be any exception to the general rule that letters prepared for the press are the most sickening and tiresome of all compositions, it will certainly be found in the familiar letters of James Howell, commonly called Epistolæ Ho-Elizianæ, which compose one of the most curious volumes in English literature."—Lon. Retrospect. Rev., iv. 183-200, 1821, q. v.

4. A Perfect Description of the People and Country of Scotland, 1649, 4to. Reprinted; also in The North Briton, No. 13.

"At its reappearance there was some talk of prosecuting the publisher for a libel; but it is surprising that such extravagant preposterous stuff should excite any emotion but contempt."—Wat's Bibl. Brit.

The reader who desires to know more of Howell and his publications must refer, in addition to authorities already cited, to Biog. Brit., Lloyd's Memoirs, and Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 974-975. We marvel that some of the enterprising British publishers—the Nicholes, Bohns, or Parkers, who have done so much for the revival of ancient English lore—have not presented us with a new edit. of Epistolæ Ho-Elizianæ; for, in the words of an eminent authority,

"It is refreshing to turn from the cobweb compositions of the present day, in which there is so strength of material, to the sterling sense and lively wit of these familiar letters."—Lon. Retrospect. Rev., vol. iv. p. 300, 1821.

The new editor of the Letters, if such an individual should make his appearance, must endeavour to procure the late Henry Faulstich's illustrated copy, bound in three imperial folios.

Townsend, Recorder of Macclesfield, and author of several valuable half-legal, half-historical works. A review of Howell's State Trials will be found in Edin. Rev., xxxi. 235-246. Miss Mitford hung over the State Trials with delight:

"Of all collected works, those I liked best—better than the poets from Chaucer to Tennyson, better than the dramatists from Shakespeare to Talfourd—were those most real and exciting of all dramas called trials."—Recollec. of a Literary Life.

We avow the same taste, though not quite to the same extent, and are now in anxious quest of a copy of the State Trials, and trust that before the reader sees this article we shall see the thirty-four goodly octavos adorning our library-shelves.

Howitt, Emma. Letters during a Tour through the United States, Nottingham, circa 1830, 12mo.

Howitt, Mary, a daughter of Mr. Botham, of Uttoxeter, a member of the Society of Friends, was married to William Howitt, a congenial spirit, in 1821. The lives of both have been so well told in a publication just issued, and accessible to all, (Men of the Time, Lon., 1856,) that it will be unnecessary to repeat what we should be unable to improve. Moreover, the plan of our work is better answered by a list of their publications, with some critical notices of their characteristics as writers,—which citations of opinions we are obliged to restrict within very narrow limits.

In 1823 Mr. and Mrs. Howitt gave to the world their first publication,—The Forest Minstrel, which was succeeded in 1827 by The Desolation of Eyam, and other Poems. To these joint productions may be added, The Book of the Seasons, first pub. in 1831, and The Literature and Romance of Northern Europe, issued in 1852, and Stories of English Life, in Bohn's Illustrated Library, 1853. The following alphabetical catalogue—compiled with considerable labour, and, we trust, nearly if not quite complete—of Mary Howitt's separate publications evinces no ordinary amount of literary industry. 1. Alice Franklin, 1843, 18mo. 2. Ballads and other Poems, 1847, p. 8vo. 3. Birds and Flowers, and other Country Things, 1848, 12mo. 4. Do., Second Series, 1855, sq. 5. Children's Year, 1847, 16mo. 6. Dial of Love, 1852, 12mo. 7. Heir of West Wayland, 1851, 12mo. 8. *Hope on! Sargent, sq.; 2d ed., 1844; 3d ed., 1845. The popularity of this work, from Poland to France, with the younger members of the household, is well known. A celebrated German review remarks of it:

"Of this production, which makes itself an epoch in the world of children, it is superfluous to speak. The Fable-Book is throughout all Germany in the hands of parents and children, and will always be new, because every year fresh children are born."

49. Citizen of Prague; 2d ed., 1846, 8 vols. p. 8vo. 50. The Peasant and his Landlord, by Baroness Knorring, 1848, 2 vols. 8vo.

The above register affords a tolerable proof that Mary Howitt has not "eaten the bread of idleness;" but, if to these volumes—many of them exhibiting evidences of no little toil—we add her contributions for the last thirty years to the periodicals of the day,—to The Amulet, The Literary Souvenir, The Drawing Room Scrap-Book, (of which she was for three years the editor,) The People's Journal, &c.,—we shall have an aggregate of printed matter which few authors of the day can equal. But unfortunately the mere fact of voluminousness does not always imply either merit on the part of the author or advantage on that of the public. The great question is not as to quantity, but as to quality. By many writers we should have been benefited more had they written less; and of many it is to be regretted that they ever wrote at all. But if of any we can justly say,—This pen has ever been employed in the advocacy of the true, the beautiful, and the good; the alleviation of human suffering, and the cure of social disorders; the education of the mind, and the improvement of the heart; the cultivation of home-duties and home-affections, and the development of fraternal unity in the great brotherhood of man;—surely of such it shall be said, Here is one worthy of honour, of love, and of praise;—and such is Mary Howitt! When we return from the pleasing contemplation of the moralist, to consider the literary merits of an instrumentality which has been so widely productive of beneficial results, we are conscious that the theme has been anticipated—not to say exhausted. Mrs. Howitt's position, whether we consider her as a poetess, a novelist, an essayist, or as an instructor of the youthful mind, is too well determined, too generally acknowledged, to require any championship at our hands. Yet we are not willing to conclude this article without the adduction of at least a few tributes to the merits of one whose happiness it is to number as many friends as she has readers, and to have as few enemies as she has written worthless books.

"There can be no surer proof of the genuineness of the poetical power possessed by Mary Howitt, than the fact that her finer pieces ever recur again and again to the memories of all imaginative readers. This can be only owing to their feminine tenderness, their earnest tone, their gentle music, and their simple but genuine nature."—Mrs. Howitt's Sketches of the Past, &c.

"Mary Howitt has shown herself mistress of every string of the minstrel lyre, save that which sounds of broil and bloodshed. There is more of the old ballad simplicity in her compositions than can be found in the strains of any living poet besides; her language is vigorous, but not swelling; and always subordinate to the sentiments, whether of tenderness or of love."—Allen Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"Her poems are always graceful and beautiful, and often vigorous, but they are essentially feminine; they afford evidences of a kindly and generous nature, as well as of a fertile imagination and a safely-cultivated mind."—Mrs. Hall.

"Her language is chaste and simple, her feelings tender and pure, and her observation of nature accurate and intense."—CHRISTOPHER NORTH: Notes Ambrosianae; Blackw. Mag., xiv. 674.

"Sweet Mary Howitt! her name brings a magic with it, let us see it when and where we will! It is one crowded with pleasant associations; telling of wisdom learned by the wayside and under the hedgerows; breathing perfumes—not the perfumes of balls and routs, but—of violets and wild flowers; leading the mind to pure and pleasant thoughtfulness."—New Monthly Magazine.

"Mary Howitt, the poetess alike of the Fireside and of the Field, and perhaps the most popular of all our female writers, takes a rank second to none among the fair poets of our country. . . . Not content with showing that she possesses noble powers, Mrs. Howitt exhibits the rare ambition of using her gifts nobly; and with an earnest eloquence, which often reaches sublimity, she preaches herself the poet of the Young, and the Humble, and the Poor. Her sympathies with all classes are strong."

"All tears Which human sorrow sheds are dear to her; but with these classes they are overpowering. . . . In summing up my imperfect estimate of Mary Howitt, I would say that no Female Poet in our literature surpasses her, and that but few equal her. As a versifier, as a moralist, and as a philosopher, she may safely challenge comparison with any writer of her own sex, and with most of the writers of the other sex; whilst as regards grace, pathos, womanly sentiment, and Christian sympathy, she has scarcely a rival near her throne. I believe that her writings have done more to elevate our ideas of woman's intellectual character than all the treatises on that subject in our language."—Reviews of Female Poets of Great Britain.

Howitt, Richard, brother of William and Mary Howitt, settled for four years as a physician at Melbourne, Australia, has given us the results of his observations in his work entitled (1.) Impressions of Australia Felix, during Four Years' Residence in that Colony: Australian Poems, &c., Lon., 1845, 12mo; 1847, 12mo.

Mr. Howitt has also given to the world (2.) Antediluvian Sketches, and other Poems, 1830, 12mo, pp. 148.

"Richard, too, has a true poetical feeling, and no small poetical power. His unpretending volume of verses well deserves a place in the library along with those of his enlightened relative; for he loves nature truly as they do, and nature has returned his affection."—*CHRISTOPHER NORTH: Notes Ambrosianae; Blackw. Howitt, William, b. 1794, at Heanor, in Derbyshire, the husband and literary associate of Mary Howitt, has been already briefly noticed in our article devoted to the latter, in which the reader is referred for further information to the life of Mr. Howitt in Men of the Time, Lond., 1844. The following alphabetical list of the works of this popular author includes all of which we can find any account: 1. A Word to Dissenters, 1839. 2. Aristocracy of England; a History for the People, by John Hampden, Jr., 1844, 12mo; 2d ed., 1846, 12mo; also, 3d ed. 3. Book of the Seasons, or, A Calendar of Nature, 1831, 12mo; 7th ed., 1844, 12mo; 8th ed., 1845, 12mo; in conjunction with Mary Howitt.

"SARAZMA 'But what is this Bye-book of the Seasons? Now: 'In it the Howitts have wished to present us with all their poetic and picturesque features—a Calendar of Nature, comprehensive and complete in itself—which, on being taken up by the lover of nature at the opening of each month, should lay before him in prospect all the objects and appearances which the month would present, in the garden, in the field, and the waters, yet containing itself solely to those objects. Such, in their own words, is said to be their aim.' SARAZMA: 'And was insignificant aim either, Mr. Howitt hit it?' NESTOR: 'They have.'—Notes Androsensis: Athens. Mag., xix, 708.

12. History of England. This work is at the present time (1856) in course of publication. It is pub. in numbers to the amount of 100,000 weekly. It will probably employ Mr. Howitt for several years to come. 13. History of Priestcraft, 1834, 12mo; 7th ed., 1844, 12mo; 8th ed., 1848, 12mo. The author is at the present moment (Nov. 1856) preparing a new and still more complete edit. of this work, which will be enriched with much new matter.

"Every reader turns with pleasure to these passages of Romeo, Pope, and Bolina, which describe how they lived and where they died."—Sarum Review.

Mr. Howitt's motto on the title-page of this work is very happily selected:

"As indelible signs of their existence has stamped itself on the cheek of all distinguished men, a sign which places all the dead spirits in communion with them."—The Ocean of Pygmy.

This work was commended by The Examiner, The Atlas, &c., and received very faint commendation from the Literary Gazette; but the Athenaeum was much less lenient,—saying the work

"Two glowing volumes, not very subtle or sound in their criticism, nor very novel in design and treatment. They are extremely inaccurate in facts; with very little in them derived from books, and that little of the commonest kind. There is a fair sprinkling of errors throughout, and there are some good passages derived from personal observation."—Edin., 1857, 36-41, 56-58.

At this critique Mr. Howitt felt himself greatly aggrieved, and so expressed himself, whereupon the reviewer returned to the attack with renewed ardour, (see Athenaeum, 1847, 147-149.) Other notices of the work will be found on pp. 96, (a melancholy instance of bad temper and injustice by a correspondent of the journal,) 123, 151, 173, 206, 201, 1175.

"Mr. Howitt has indeed done something to mark localities and homes; but for the full knowledge and intelligent criticism that would surround these landmarks with clusters of associations, making bare walls eloquent and giving speech to all the neighbouring objects, we look in vain. The Homes and Haunts, instead of being original contributions, are in fact nothing more than a collection of brief and promiscuous biographies made up in general from well-known sources, and tediously full of anecdotes."—The Britanno.

"When our author is content with description, we follow him with pleasure, when he generalizes, we lose our confidence, if not our pleasure. His strength lies in a fresh and hearty appreciation of nature, of customs, and of character. What he most clearly he can present clearly to the eye. His book consists of a series of excellent snapshots, in which we see the very form and pressure of Australian life."—Lon. Athenaeum, 1844, 688-670.

16. Life and Adventures of Jack of the Mill, 1844, 3 vols. 8vo; 1845, 3 vols. 8vo; 1849, 3 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Howitt possesses the happy knack of accommodating himself to the youthful mind; and there can be no question that his Jack of the Mill will become a favourite."—Lon. Chronicle.

17. Literature and Romance of Northern Europe, 1842, 2 vols. p. 8vo; in conjunction with Mary Howitt. This creditable work, the only complete one of the kind in the English language, will be more and more prized in proportion as the taste for Scandinavian literature becomes generally diffused among scholars in Great Britain and the United States. It is an excellent guide to the literature of Sweden, Denmark, Norway, and Iceland, with copious specimens of the histories, romances, legends, dramas, ballads, &c. of these countries. See Lon. Athenaeum, 1842, 480-492.

19. Pantike; or, Traditions of Ancient Times, 1838, 3 vols. 8vo. 20. Rural and Domestic Life of Germany; with Characteristic Sketches of its Chief Cities and Scenery collected in a general Tour, and during a Residence in that Country in the Years 1840-42, 1843, mod. 8vo. With above 50 illustrations. This vol. is commended, on the whole, by the Athenaeum; but it is objected that "Mr. Howitt is too fond of stating impressions as general truths. Neither can we recommend the reader to place much reliance on his judgment in art, or his sweeping sketches of literature and opinion."—1848, 1080-1082, 1090-1092.

"A volume which will add to William Howitt's literary reputation, and be read with delight by thousands of his countrymen, as being the first faithful and comprehensive account of a people to whom they are allied by a kindred language and kindred dispositions. The engraved illustrations are perfect gems of art."—Lon. Atlas.

"We think this work the most interesting of any thing William Howitt has done. It possesses all his well-known excellence, and derives from its subject the attraction of both novelty and knowledge."—Lon. Spectator.

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE GERMAN. 25. Peter Schlemihl; from Adelbert Von Chamisso; German and English, 1843, 16mo. 26. The Student-Life of Germany; from the unpublished MSS. of Dr. Cornelius, 1841, med. 8vo. This work was written for and at the solicitation of Mr. Howitt. It contains nearly forty of the most famous songs of the German students, in German and English, with the original music, adapted to the piano-forte by Herr Winkelmeyer. This work was sharply criticised in England; but in Germany it has been highly commended. Some of the habits of some of the German students are not the most refined in the world; but that is not Mr. Howitt's fault. See *Eccl. 28. Universal Hist. of Magic; from the German of Dr. Joseph Ennemoser. To which is added an appendix of apparitions, dreams, second-sight, somnambulism, &c., selected by Mary Howitt. Bohn's Scientific Library, vols. xiii., xiv., p. 8vo, 1854. In this translation, made whilst on his voyage to Australia, Mr. Howitt was assisted by his eldest son. The character of Ennemoser's work is well known to the German scholar. Mr. Howitt has long contemplated the publication of a history of the Life and Times of George Fox; but whether it will ever see the light is perhaps doubtful. In addition to the works above noticed, he is the author of the article "Quakers" in the 7th edit. of the Encyclopedia Britannica, many pieces in The Literary Souvenir, The Amulet, &c., and, in conjunction with Mary Howitt, edited, for the three years of its continuance, (1847–49, 3 vols. r. 8vo,) Howitt's Journal, a periodical which started with a circulation of 30,000 copies. It was purchased by the owner of the People's Journal, (of which Mr. Howitt had been a co-proprietor and manager,) in consequence of some pecuniary difficulties. Both journals are now extinct, to the great loss of the intelligent portion of the middle classes of Great Britain.

We have quoted many opinions respecting Mr. Howitt's merits and demerits as a writer, but are obliged to withhold many more from want of space. Whilst we are far from deeming him infallible, and consider that in his earnestness to enlighten (as he supposes) the public mind he has at times treated some most important themes with censurable levity and culpable irreverence, yet we cannot coincide with the reproach that the Reformer should not expose evils without at the same time providing for their extirpation. I might as well blame a neighbour for apprising me that my house was on fire, because he failed to inform me immediately of a certain mode of extinguishing the flames; or forbid my physician to announce the presence of disease, unless he undertook at the same moment to arrest its course. With the exception, therefore, hinted at above, many of our countrymen and countrywomen will unite with the commendation of our highest literary authority:

"We rejoice to see the works of the Howitts, whatever they may be, republished amongst us. Their names have a pleasant sound; their writings are sure to be animated by a kindly, humane spirit; and no one can leave them without feeling that he has been in delightful company."—N. Amer. Rev.

In the last quarter of a century (few authors have been able so long to command the undiminished interest of a novelty-loving public) many kind things have been said of William and Mary Howitt; but we doubt if any tribute is more highly prized than that of Christopher North, recorded in the 56th Number of Noctes Ambrosianae, April, 1831: see Blackwood's Magazine, xxix. 699–700. For the preparation of this history the State paid him £50. For much of the most important portion of the earlier annals he was indebted to Winthrop's MS. Journal; and Hubbard's MS., in turn, was of great service to Mather, Prince, Hutchinson, Holmes, &c.:

"To style, indeed, Hubbard has in this work afforded little attention, or rather has employed several modes of composition in his different chapters, here dilating in a careful examination of events and discussion of principles, there confining himself to the most meagre manner of the humblest diary. But his skill may be ascertained from his election sermon, [1676.] which no work of the two next generations surpassed. . . . Hubbard's claims as the historian of the great war of 1675-76 are universally acknowledged, for three editions have made his Indian Wars well known."

"In a word, he is learned without ostentation and vanity, and gives all his productions such a delicate turn and grace, (as is seen in his printed Sermons and History of the Indian Wars,) that the features and lineaments of the Child make a clear discovery and distinction of the Father: yet is he a man of singular modesty, of strict morals, and has done as much for the conversion of the Indians as most men in England."—John Dunton's Life and Errors, ed. 1813, i. 183-184, q. v. for a favourable account of the worthy divine's love of hospitality and good books.

The Works of William Shakespeare: The Text carefully restored according to the First Editions; with Introductions, Notes, Original and Selected, and a Life of the Poet, Munroe & Co., Bost., 1851-56, 11 vols. 16mo. As regards size and print, this edition is modelled upon the favourite one in England known as the Chiswick Edition. It contains all the Plays, Poems, and Sonnets of Shakespeare. We have several commendations before us of Mr. Hudson's editorial labours, but have space for the following only:

"There is every probability that as soon as Mr. Hudson's Shakespeare becomes known, as it well deserves to be, in this country, it will meet with no inconsiderable amount of patronage here."—New (London) Quarterly Review.

"Mr. Verplanck has brought the treasures of a various and recondite learning, with no common share of critical sagacity, to the illustration of Shakespeare. Following in the same direction, but striking out a new path, Mr. Hudson has enriched the literature of our language with the fruits of his studies, mastering the difficulties of the poet with wonderful ingenuity, seizing the spirit of his characterization with kindred subtlety, and, in a singularly nervous and racy style, presenting some of the finest specimens of critical analysis of which any modern writer can boast."

Mr. Hudson has been a contributor to the Church Review, the American Whig Review, and the Democratic Review, and in 1850 pub. a Sermon entitled Old Wine in Old Bottles. In 1857 he originated and edited the American Church Monthly, pub. in N. York.

Hughes, John, 1677-1720, a native of Marlborough, a contributor to The Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, and the author of the whole or the principal part of the Essays, Discourses, &c. of the Lay Monk, (2d ed., 1714, 12mo,) a sequel to the Spectator, has lost the poetical reputation which he enjoyed. He was educated at a Dissenters' Academy in London, and subsequently held a place in the Office of Ordnance, and was Secretary to the Commissioners for the purchasing of lands for the royal dock-yards. Later in life he was Secretary to the Commissioners of the Peace. 1. Poem on the Peace of Ryswick, 1697. 2. The Court of Neptune, 1699. 3. Ode on the Death of K. William, 1702. 4. Ode in Praise of Music, 1703, 4to. 5. Spenser's Works, with Life, &c., 1715, 6 vols. 12mo. 6. The Siege of Damascus; a Tragedy, 1720, 8vo. The author died on the same night that this piece was first performed with great applause. 7. Poems and Prose Essays, 1735, 2 vols. 12mo; Poeth. He trans. Fontenelle's Dialogues of the Dead, and Discourse concerning the Ancients and Moderns, the Abbé Vertot's Hist. of the Revolutions in Portugal, Letters of Abelard and Heloise, and wrote the preface to the Complete Hist. of England, 1706, 3 vols. fol. His Correspondence was pub. by the Rev. J. Duncombe, with Notes, 1772, 3 vols. 12mo; 2d ed., 1773, 3 vols. p. 8vo. As a translator, Hughes is entitled to considerable credit: of his original efforts The Siege of Damascus is the only piece by which he is now known to the reading public. Addison thought so highly of Hughes's dramatic abilities that he begged him to write the fifth Act of Cato:

"Hughes was very capable of writing this fifth Act. The Siege of Damascus is a better tragedy than Cato, though Pope affected to speak alightingly of its author."—Dr. Joseph Warton: Note to Pope's Prologue to Cato.

"He [Hughes] is too grave a poet for me, and, I think, among the Mediocrities in prose as well as verse."—Swift to Pope.

"What he wanted in genius, he made up as an honest man; but he was of the class you think him."—Pope to Swift.

Dr. Johnson, who in his life of Hughes quotes the above, (and more of the same correspondence,) avoids giving any opinion respecting the literary merits of his author; but it is easy to perceive that he agrees with the estimate he cites. An eminent critic, in his comments upon the merits of our author, remarks:

"The only piece, however, which can with any propriety claim for Hughes the appellation of a poet, is The Siege of Damascus. Of this Drama, which is still occasionally acted, the sentiments and morality are pure and correct, the imagery frequently beautiful, and the diction and versification for the most part clear and melodious. It is defective, notwithstanding, in the most essential quality of dramatic composition, the power of affecting the passions; and is, therefore, more likely to afford pleasure in the closet than on the stage. . . . Hughes has more merit as a translator of poetry than as an original poet. . . . On the prose of Hughes I am inclined to bestow more praise than on his poetry. . . . All the periodical essays of Hughes are written in a style which is, in general, easy, correct, and elegant; they occasionally exhibit wit and humour; and they uniformly tend to inculcate the best precepts, moral, prudential, and religious."—Drake's Essays illustrative of the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, (vol. iii. 25-50,) q. a. for an account of Hughes's share in these periodicals; and see the Prefaces to the various edits. of these works.

Hughes, John, the "Builder of Brasenose," (though really of Oriel,) celebrated in Wilson's Christopher in the Tent, was the author of an Itinerary of Provence and the Rhone during 1819, (1822, 8vo, 1829, 8vo,) and poetical and other compositions. The literary merits of Hughes are depicted in glowing terms by Miss Mitford in her Recollections; and a still greater authority has lavished his encomiums upon the Itinerary:

"A poet, a draughtsman, and a scholar, who gives such an animated description of Chateau Grignan, the dwelling of Madame de Sévigné's beloved daughter, that no one who has ever read the book would be within fifty miles of the same without going a pilgrimage to the spot."—Sir Walter Scott.

This work contains thirteen good etchings by the author; and a set of Views in Provence and on the Rhone, r. 4to, illustrative of the Itinerary, was engraved by W. B. Cooke.

"Was not his Providence and the Rhone almost the only book ever praised in the Waverley Novels? [In Quentin Durward.] Does not he contrive in his journals to make his pen do double duty as sketcher and writer?"—MISS MITTROMAN: ubi supra.

Hughes, the Most Rev. John, D.D., Archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church in New York, b. in the North of Ireland, 1798, came to America in 1817, was educated at the College of Mount St. Mary, Emmetsburg, Maryland; ordained in 1826, and shortly afterwards appointed pastor of a church in Philadelphia; Bishop-administrator of the Diocese of New York, 1838; Archbishop of the R. The censures of the Athenæum—a portion of which only we have above quoted—elicited some comments from Dr. Hume, for which see same periodical, 1847, p. 796. The Lon. Medical Gazette and the Lon. Spectator commend the work in high terms.

Hume, Alexander, 1560?–1609, minister of Logie, grandson of Patrick Hume, fifth Baron of Polworth, pub. in 1599, Edin., 4to, a book entitled Hymnes, or Sacred Songs, portions of which have been several times reprinted, and the whole was repub. lately by the Bannatyne Club. Of these pieces, the Day Festival is considered the most beautiful, and was highly commended by Dr. Leyden and others. An account of this author and three other Alexanders Hume will be found in Chambers and Thomson's Biog. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen, 1855, 92–96. Watt ascribes to this writer two theolog. treatises, but we presume them to have been written by the next-named Alexander Hume.

Hume, David, of Godscroft, the author of The History of the House and Race of Douglas and Angus, Edin., 1644, fol., (1743, 2 vols. 12mo; 4th ed., 1748, 2 vols. 12mo), is supposed to have been born about 1560. He also wrote Apologia Basilica, Paris, 1626, 4to, several theolog. treatises, and a number of Latin poems, some of which, first pub. separately, were afterwards reprinted in Johnston's Deliciæ Poetarum Scotorum. In 1632, Paris, sm. 8vo, appeared Humli (Davidis) Wedderburnensis, Poemata Omnia, accessere ad Finem Unio Britannica, et Prælium ad Lipsiam soluta Oratione. Contains poems addressed to Q. Elizabeth, James the Sixth of Scotland, Sir Francis Walsingham, &c. Constable's copy sold for £3. An account of this author will be found in Chambers and Thomson's *Biog. Hume, David, April 26, 1711–August 25, 1776, a native of Edinburgh, was the second son of Joseph Hume, or rather Home, of Ninewells, near Dunse, Scotland, a descendant of the Earl of Home. The subject of our notice, after an unsatisfactory attempt to master the study of the law, and a like unsuccessful essay (in 1734) as a merchant's clerk in Bristol, went to France, with the design of pursuing there, in an economical manner, those literary pursuits in which alone he took any interest. In 1737 he came to London, and in the year following gave to the world his Treatise of Human Nature. This, his first publication, was not successful; but it is difficult to discourage a young author who has once seen his compositions in print, and in 1741 appeared his Essays, Moral and Political. This work met with more favour, and he was induced to follow it up in 1748 with Philosophical Essays concerning Human Understanding, (in fact, a new edit. of the first part of his Treatise of Human Nature); in 1751 with An Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals; in 1752 with Political Discourses; and in 1755 with The Natural Hist. of Religion, &c. It was between the dates of the two last-named publications that Hume put forth the first vol. of the work by which his name will be transmitted to the latest posterity. The publication of the History of England—1st ed. in 6 vols. 4to, Lon.—was as follows:—Vol. I. The Reigns of James I. and Charles I., 1754. II. The Commonwealth, and the Reigns of Charles II. and James II., 1756. III. IV. The Reigns of Henry VII., Henry VIII., Edward VI., Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth, 1759. V., VI. From the Invasion of Julius Cæsar to the Revolution in 1688, 1761–62. For the dates and particulars of various edit. of the History of England, (the Abridgments, Continuations, &c.) and of the other publications of the author, the reader is referred to Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; the London catalogues of British publications. The principal editors and continuators of Hume's History are Blisset, Burke, Farr, Hereford, Hughes, Jones, Miller, Mitchell, Stebbing, Tallis, and Wright. We may be permitted to select a few edit. of the History for special notice,—viz.: 1. 1779, 8 vols. 4to, the best 4to edit. 2. 1778; also in 1784, 8 vols. 8vo; the last edit. corrected by the author. 3. 1789, with Smollett, 13 vols. 8vo. 4. 1796, 13 vols. 8vo; with Portraits. 5. 1802, 18 vols. 8vo; with Portraits. 6. 1803, 16 vols. 8vo; with Portraits. 7. 1806, 70 Nos. fol. In vol. I. will be found Hume's Autobiography, his Will, a notice of his last illness, by Adam Smith, and a documentary account of the controversy—if so it may be called—between Hume and Rousseau.

It is now time to return to the personal history of the author, preparatory to a brief examination of his characteristics as a man of letters. Although the first vol. of the History was at first severely censured, and then almost entirely neglected by the public, yet the appearance of his Dissertation on the Natural History of Religion before the publication of the second stimulated the languishing curiosity of the reading world, and Hume found himself at last in possession of that literary distinction for which he had long pined in secret. The demand for the succeeding vols. was so great, that fortune was added to fame; and the former was subsequently augmented by several diplomatic and other political appointments; among which was the Secretaryship of the French Embassy, 1763–65, and the post of Under-Secretary of State under General Conway, 1767–68. In 1769 he bade adieu to public life and the literary circles of London, and returned to the city of his birth, doubtless with much of that yearning for old scenes and old friends so beautifully described by the author of The Deserted Village. He returned home, he tells us, "very opulent," for he "possessed a revenue of £1000 a year; healthy, and, though somewhat stricken in years, with the prospect of enjoying long his ease." But, notwithstanding the natural desire of the philosopher his days had now approached their termination. In the spring of 1775 he was attacked with a disorder of the bowels, which gradually sapped his strength, and resulted fatally on the 25th of August, 1776. After his death appeared, in 1779, 8vo, his Dialogues concerning Natural Religion; and in 1783, 12mo; were pub. his disgraceful Essays upon Suicide. The mischievous effects of these unphilosophical speculations, therefore, were thus extended, to the injury of others, after the author had gone to his account. The excellence of Hume's character as a man has been so well described by Mr. Mackenzie, in the story of La Roche, (see The Mirror, Nos. 42, 43, 44,) and so unequivocally attested by Adam Smith and other contemporaries, that it is quite unnecessary to enlarge upon this head. In the autobiography from which we have quoted above, the reader will be often reminded—notwithstanding the more ambitious style of the Historian of Rome—of the charming narration of Gibbon of the incidents of his own life.

"To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flame from wasting, by repose,"

We have now to consider the subject of our notice, first, in the character of a Mental and Moral Philosopher; secondly, in that of a Political Philosopher and Political Economist; and, thirdly, in that of a Historian. It is hardly necessary to remind the reader that all that can justly be expected of us, in the limits to which we are necessarily circumscribed, is an indication of the best sources of knowledge respecting the authors of whom we test, and brief citations of the recorded opinions of eminent authorities in the same departments of learning which the former have mentioned.

KNOWN AS A MENTAL AND MORAL PHILOSOPHER.

Of Man's Essence, Moral and Metaphysical, Lord
Brougham remarks:

"To reach this well-known literary production of great utility, much closer argument, some essential common ground, consideration of originality, is impossible, but a love of singularity, an aversion to agree with other men, and particularly with the bulk of the people, prevails very manifestly throughout the work, and we may remark that it is the author's earliest production, the Tranquilo or Manana Manus, which formed the basis of the whole, having been written before his six-and-twentieth year, and before he had been conversing with the world.

The boldness of striking opinions held among the young men here, is apt to have much share in this and any similar kind.

"Accordingly, to find all wrong in the opinions which man generally entertains, whether upon moral, metaphysical, or theological subjects, and to punish his theories to an extreme point in almost every instance. . . . As for his inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals, of which he had himself formed so high an estimate, this is indeed a very excellent work, and appears well to deserve the esteem pronounced upon it by the author, although his Political Discourses may be superior in the originality and importance of their views. . . . There is in this treatise a copiousness and facility of illustration rarely anywhere else to be found, and it is full of learned allusions and references, showing the various and extensive reading in which he had indulged. Nor is it the least remarkable feature of the work, that, though produced by him before all the other productions of his genius, it contains nothing at all even bordering upon mystical opinions."—Life of Alison, in Lives of Men of Letters of the Time of George III., London and Glas. 1865.

"It was in his twenty-seventh year that Mr. Home published at London the Treatise of Human Nature, the first systematic attempt on all the principles of knowledge and belief, and the most formidable if universal scepticism could ever be shown than a man

... The great operator did not in this were some honest, like Bayle, with dialectical acumen, which only inspire a disposition towards doubt, by showing in detail the uncertainty of most opinions. He stood at proving, not that nothing was known, but that nothing could be known from the structure of the Understanding, to demonstrate that we are doomed forever to dwell in absolute and universal ignorance.
 ... The Inquiry [Concerning the Principles of Morals, affords perhaps the best specimen of his style. In substance, its chief merit is the proof, from an abundant enumeration of particulars, that all the qualities and actions of the mind which are generally approved by mankind agree in the circumstances of being useful to society. ... On parity of manners, it must be agreed that Mr. Hume, though he controverted no rule, yet treats them with too much indulgence." — See JAMES MACFARLANE, Diogenes, in Miami Works, printed by Steger, &c., also in his Miami Works, 1866, vol.

—From what has been already said, it may be seen that we need not look to Mr. Huxley's Theory of Human Nature for any new or attempted system. It is neither a scheme of Materialism nor a scheme of Spiritualism for his vocabulary strikes equally at the root of both these theories. His aim is to establish a universal scepticism, and to produce in the reader a complete distrust in his own faculties. With the single exception of Huxley, he has carried this empirical mode of reasoning further than any other modern philosopher. —JAMES GREGG: Freedom, Dec. 20, to Harper, N.Y., and on his Works.

"The centre of Hume's philosophy is his criticism of the conception of cause. Locke had already expressed the thought that we obtain the conception of substances only by the habit of always finding certain modes together. Hume takes up this thought with enthusiasm. Whence do we know, he asks, that one thing must be such when in the relation of cause and rise things which to men seem in the solution of cases and effort. There needs no further proof than simply to utter these chief thoughts of it, so, to show that his suspicion is only a logical necessity, and not a mere guess. Every determination of possibility and necessity must all away, if the doctrine of knowledge only from perceptions through the senses determinations must be completed in sensation. — Dr. Albert

 Schlegel's Hist. of Philos., trans. by J. B. Seelye, New York,

"Dr. Reid rendered good service to the cause of truth, in opposition to the mystical philosophy of Hegel, who despotically availed himself of the authority of Locke in the support of his own mischievous dogmas."—Dr. E. Williams's Christian Pioneer, Jan. 1848.

That scepticism is the real result of the theory we have now described (Leahy's Ideal System) is once more the case that has been actually made of it. Berkeley drew from it his arguments against the existence of the material world, and Hume based upon the same the principles by which he sought to involve the whole superstructure of human knowledge. From his very childhood, in one sense of doubt and confusion. . . . But, in his early life, had been a complete believer in this representative theory, and had leaned strongly to Berkeleyism, as the natural result. But when Mr Hume's treatise on Human Nature came forth in the world, and he saw the consequences to which the whole theory must ultimately lead, he began to inquire within himself whether that theory were really a true one. This inquiry, according to

His own method, he carried on, probably for above forty years, and never could gain any affirmative evidence on the question except the mere dictum of philosophers. The philosophy of Hume, as a whole, originated and fell with himself. A more partial and less daring empiricism might probably have gained many followers, but it is the inevitable result of every system professing universal axioms, to destroy itself. The man who by any process of reasoning isolates every portion of human knowledge in the form of a maxim, and then attempts to deduce conclusions from them little more than contrives his own principles by a redoubt of absurdities."—Murphy's Hist. of Mod. Philos., p. 367.

In our life of Jeremy Bentham, in this Dictionary, we have briefly noticed the famous doctrine of Utility, of which Hume was one of the first and most distinguished teachers.

Before leaving this branch of our subject, it may be expected that we should make some comments on that unfortunate production of our author's,—the Essay on Miracles; but a natural reluctance to dwell on the follies to which even great minds are but too prone would induce us to linger upon the recollection of this melancholy example of intellectual sophistry and literary dishonesty, had we not already treated the subject at sufficient length in the previous pages of this work. The reader is referred to the article on APAR, W., D.D., (the friend of Johnson:); CAMPBELL, GEORGE, D.D.; DOUGLAS, JOHN; Leland's Doctrinal Writers, Works of Wm. Ellery Channing; Works of Mr. Paley; Lowndes's Brit. Lit., 833, 862-864, 991-1001; Remarks upon the Nat. Hist. of Religion, by Mr. Hume, &c., by R. T., Loc., 1758, 6vo; and many of the authorities cited above and below. This matter may be very well dismissed with the sensible reflections of Sir Walter Scott, in his account of the Life and Writings of the historian's friend, John Hume

"The eminent David Home, the philosopher and historian, was certainly the most distinguished person to the epoch, (the literary society of Scotland.) That he was most unhappy in perceiving the artlessness of his intellect, and the pride arising from the consciousness of possessing them, to leave him in a state of scepticism (I think), is most understandable, as well as that he was highly culpable in giving to the world the miserable results of his labours."

HUME AS A POLITICAL PHILOSOPHER AND POLITICAL ECONOMIST.

Here our citations must necessarily be very brief; but they will be found to be of the most unequivocal character.

"Of the Political Discourse it would be difficult to speak in terms of the great composition. They combine almost every excellence which can belong to such a performance. The great merit, however, of these Discourses, is their originality, and the political economy which they contain, the author of the modern world of wisdom, which are to a great extent, and are only possibly fullest extent in the affairs of the most important projection of one deserving the name of legibility of the theory, although our predecessors require a new understanding the practical business. Dr. Smith's celebrated work, with regular system than the detailed facility of the latter's opinions is published full American years ago by BINGHAM and many.

One of the most eminent of modern Political Economists remarks that Home's

"Buses on Cameroons, Liberia, Malinas of Trade, Money, Janbury of Trade, and Public Credit, display the same ability of style and illustration that distinguish the other works of their celebrated author. His views of the commercial intercourse that should subsist among nations are both enlightened and liberal; and he has admirably exposed the groundlessness of the prejudices then entertained against a free intercourse with France, and the fear of being deprived, were commercial rivalries established, of a salted supply of bullion. The misery among the Population of Ancient Nations will be noticed in another part of this work. Home and Smith are and pointed out the injurious operation of the Malthusian theory, and exposed the absurdity of our meddling the trade with France to that of supplying a country as Portugal."—McCulloch's Ed. of Polit. Econ., 1844, 1846.

"The political discourses of Hume are the best models we have of the reasoning that belongs to subjects of this nature. They hasten us to the slow step with which we should advance, and the wary distrust with which we should look around before we think that we have reached a main in politics,—that is, a general principle on the steady efficiency of which, in real practice, we may always depend. . . . And here I would recommend to my readers one of the essays of Mr. Hume,—that on the Populosity of Ancient Nations. . . . The laws of Henry the Seventh merit the consideration of the student. It was the intention of these laws to advance the husbandry, manufactures, and general commerce of the country. The observations of Lord Bacon, and the subsequent criticisms of Hume, will afford the student a lesson in that most difficult and important of all practical sciences, the science of political economy. . . . A great part of Smith's reasonings (in the 3d Book of the Wealth of Nations) had appeared in the History of Hume. These two eminent philosophers—for on the subjects of political economy and morals they deserve the name—had, no doubt, in their mutual intercourse enlightened and confirmed the inquiries and conclusions of each other.”—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.

“Hume was gifted with admirable sagacity in political economy; and it is the good sense and depth of his views on that important subject, then for the first time [in his History of England] brought to bear on the annals of man, that has chiefly gained for him, and with justice, the character of a philosophic historian.”—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Essays, Polit., Histor., and Miscell., Edin. and Lon., 1850, III. 78.

HUME AS A HISTORIAN.

We have already noticed the severe censure elicited by the publication of the first vol. of the History of England, and the still more provoking neglect by which this censure was succeeded. The expressed opinions of the few who ventured to read the book were certainly ill calculated to encourage the ambition of the aspiring author. But no one can tell the story so well as the historian himself:

“In 1762 the Faculty of Advocates chose me their librarian, an office for which I received little or no emolument, but which gave me the command of a large library. I then formed the plan of writing the History of England; but, being frightened with the notion of continuing a narrative through a period of seventeen hundred years, I commenced with the accession of the House of Stuart, an epoch when I thought the misrepresentations of faction began chiefly to take place. I was, I own, sanguine in my expectations of the success of this work. I thought that I was the only historian that had at once neglected present power, interest, and authority, and the cry of popular prejudices; and, as the subject was suited to every capacity, I expected proportional applause. But miserable was my disappointment: I was assailed by one cry of reproach, disapprobation, and even detestation; English, Scotch, and Irish, whig and tory, churchman and sectary, freethinker and religionist, patriot and courtier, united in their rage against a man who had presumed to shed a generous tear for the fate of Charles I. and the Earl of Strafford; and after the first ebullitions of their fury were over, what was still more mortifying, the book seemed to sink into oblivion. Mr. Miller told me, that in a twelvemonth he sold only forty-five copies of it. I scarcely, indeed, heard of one man in the three kingdoms, considerable for rank or letters, that could endure the book. I must only except the primate of England, Dr. Herring, and the primate of Ireland, Dr. Stone, which seem two odd exceptions. These dignified prelates separately sent me messages not to be discouraged.”—Hume's Autobiography, pub. in 1777, by Mr. Strahan, and since prefixed to the Hist. of Eng., his Philosophical Works, &c.

Mr. Ritchie (in his Life of Hume) tells us that, after a diligent search into the literary history of the period, he has been unable to discover any trace of that universal outcry which Hume complains of. But doubtless the author heard more than any one else did; much that was said was never recorded; and of the last a large portion may be presumed to have perished or to be buried in forgotten archives. With the reception of the second vol. of his History the author had greater reason to be satisfied:

“This performance,” he tells us, “happened to give less displeasure to the Whigs, and was better received. It not only rose itself, but helped to buoy up its unfortunate brother.” As his reputation as a literary man was now well established, the remaining vols. were received with avidity, and those already pub. brought prominently into notice: the sale was sufficiently large, he informs us, to render him not only “independent, but opulent.” “Notwithstanding the variety of winds and seasons to which my writings have been exposed, they have still been making such advances, that the copy-money given me by the booksellers much exceeded any thing formerly known in England.”

It is now time to examine into the merits and demerits of a work which has so long held, and which promises ever to hold, a prominent place in the front rank of English literature. If we were obliged to compress into the limits of a single sentence the characteristics of Hume's History of England, we suppose that the following would be considered an impartial statement:—Beauty of style, carelessness of facts, and intolerance of spirit. Hume was too fastidious to be inelegant, too indolent to be accurate, too bigoted to be impartial. His ohagrin when obliged to stop the press to make important corrections on the appearance of Murdlin's State Papers, and his mortification at being obliged to write to Robertson respecting the same affair, “we are all in the wrong,” were necessary consequences of that haste which would not examine, and that ignorance which would not learn. It is declared that certain manuscripts had been spread out for his inspection at the State-Paper Office for a whole fortnight, but he never mustered sufficient courage to undertake the dreaded investigations.

“Satisfied with the common accounts, and the most obvious sources of history, when librarian at the Advocates' Library, where yet may be examined the books he used, marked by his hand, he spread the volumes about the sofa, from which he rarely rose to pursue obscure inquiries or delay by fresh difficulties the page which every day was growing under his charming pen. A striking proof of his careless happiness I discovered in his never referring to the perfect edition of Whitelocke's Memorials of 1702, but to the old truncated and listless one of 1682.”—True Sources of Secret History; in Diderot's Curiosities of Literature, ed. Lon., 1861, p. 814.

“Hume often puts the names of the monkish writers in his margin; but I fear all he knew of them was through the media of other writers. He has some mistakes which could not have occurred had he really consulted the originals. . . . Hume is certainly an admirable writer; his style bold, and his reflections shrewd and uncommon; but his religious and political notions have too often warped his judgment.”—Dr. Richard Farmer's Letter to a Friend on the Study of English History, in Goodhue's Lib. Man., 45.

“Hume was far too careless a writer, even if the taste of the public in his time had required it, to trouble himself with the minute labour necessary for this kind of investigation. Accordingly, the reader finds little in his pages to bring him acquainted with the antiquarian details of history.”—Edin. Rev., LXIX. 432.

“Hume was not, indeed, learned and well-grounded enough for those writers and investigators of history who judged his works from the usual point of view, because he was not only negligent in the use of the sources of history, but also superficial.”—Schlosser's Hist. of the 18th Cent., Davison's trans., Lon., 1844, II. 78.

“In his treatment of the elder periods of the English history, he is quite unsatisfactory and meagre: he had no love for its antiquities, and could not transport himself back into the spirit of remote ages.”—Schlegel's Lects. on the Hist. of Lit.; English trans., Phila., 1844, 331.

“The author, indeed, wanted that resolute spirit of industry and research which alone can lead an historian to become thoroughly acquainted with the valuable writers of the Middle Ages.”—Dodds's Lib. Comp., Lon., 1825, 244.

“He was far too indolent to acquire the vast store of facts indispensable for correct generalisation on the varied theatre of human affairs, and often drew hasty and incorrect conclusions from the events which particularly came under his observation.”—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Essays, Polit., Histor., and Miscell., 1850, III. 78.

Sir Archibald proceeds to adduce an example of the errors to which he refers, which example we shall presently quote from the History of Europe, 1789-1815.

The remarks which we have just quoted are preceded by some observations which we feel unwilling to omit. Sir Archibald gives his predecessor full credit for his sagacity as a political economist, (quoted above,) his ability as a political commentator and as a delineator of manners, his eloquence as an orator, (in his glowing pages,) and his skill as a debater, but continues:

“But, notwithstanding all this, Hume is far from being gifted with the philosophy of history. He has collected or prepared many of the facts necessary for the science, but he has made little progress in it himself. He was essentially a sceptic. He aimed rather at spreading doubts than shedding light. Like Voltaire and Gibbon, he was scandalously prejudiced and unjust on the subject of religion; and to write modern history without correct views on that subject is like playing Hamlet without the character of the Prince of Denmark.”

These comments were originally published in Blackwood's Magazine, (in an article on Guizot,) in Dec. 1844, and the reader will perhaps be surprised to find the following reflections from the same critic, published in The Foreign and Colonial Review, (in an article on Michelet's France,) in April of the same year:

“Considered as calm and philosophic narratives, the histories of Hume and Robertson will remain as standard models for every future age. The just and profound reflections of the former, the inimitable clearness and impartiality with which he has summed up the arguments on both sides, on the most momentous questions which have agitated England, as well as the general simplicity, uniform clearness, and occasional pathos, of his story, must forever command the admiration of mankind. In vain we are told that he is often inaccurate, sometimes partial; in vain are successive attacks published on detached parts of his narrative, by party zeal or antiquarian research: his reputation is undiminished: successive editions issuing from the press attest the continued sale of his work; and it continues its majestic course through the sea of time, like a mighty three-decker, which never even condescends to notice the javelins darted at its sides from the hostile canoes which from time to time seek to impede its progress.”—Reprinted in Essays, Edin. and Lon., 1850, III. 419-430.

We could not in fairness omit the above eulogy, as we profess to give both sides of a question, even when both are ably represented by the same impartial champion.

I have already adverted to Gardiner's resolute assertion of the law against the prince's single will, as a proof that, in spite of Hume's preposterous insinuations to the contrary, the English monarchy was known and acknowledged to be limited. . . . The misrepresentations of Hume as to the English constitution under Elizabeth, and the general administration of her reign, have been exposed, since the present chapter was written, by Mr. Brodie, in his History of the British Empire from the Accession of Charles I. to the Restoration, vol. i. c. 3. In some respects, Mr. B. seems to have gone too far in an opposite system, and to represent the practical course of government as less arbitrary than I can admit it to have been."—Hakam's Cometh. Hist. of Eng., ed. Lon., 1854, vol. i. chap. v. p. 270, n.; 284, n.

"Since I drew up this lecture, a work has been published by Mr. Brodie of Edinburgh. It is not well written in point of style, and the author must be considered as a writer on the popular side, but he is a man of research and independence of mind. It is a work of weight and learning, and it appears to me forever to have damaged, and most materially damaged, the character of Mr. Hume as an accurate historian."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.; Lect. V.

See an elaborate review of Brodie's History (Edin., 1822, 4 vols. 8vo) in the Edin. Rev., xl. 92-146.

"Hume is convicted [by Mr. Brodie] of so many inaccuracies and partial statements, that we really think his credit among historians for correctness of assertion will soon be nearly as low as it has long been with theologians for orthodoxy of belief."—Edin. Rev., ubi supra.

It is alleged that Hume, merging the character of the historian into that of the apologist, was resolved at all events to make out a fair case for the Stuarts:

"It is a piece of whining cant, and nothing better, for Hume to represent all parties of his day as being 'fired to madness against him for presuming to shed a generous tear for the fate of Charles I. and the Earl of Strafford.' No one ever found fault with the historian for shedding 'a decent tear' to the memory of the brilliant though unprincipled courtier, and his insatiable master. But he must have known well that the causes of indignation found in his volume were the false pretences put forth on behalf of these men. It was Hume's object to canonise them, and he did not scruple either to mutilate or to pervert the truth, when necessary for his purpose. Mr. Brodie has very ably and laboriously exposed the mean artifices to which this would-be-ingenuous historian has had recourse, in order to give the wished-for tone and colouring to documents which he durst not quote entire."—Cunningham's Biog. Hist. of Eng., Lon., 1852, vi. 100.

In Prof. Smyth's 5th Lect. on Mod. Hist., also, will be found instances cited of Hume's "inaccurate representation of the very authorities he quotes." Gilbert Stuart refers to this subject with no little warmth:

"From its beginning to its conclusion it [Hume's History] is chiefly to be regarded as a plausible defence of prerogative. As an elegant and spirited composition, it merits every commendation. But no friend to humanity, and to the freedom of this kingdom, will consider his constitutional inquiries, with their effect on his narrative, and compare them with the ancient and venerable monuments of our story, without feeling a lively surprise and a patriot indignation."

"Rapid and Hume are our two great historians. But it is Hume who is read by every one. Hume is the historian whose views and opinions insensibly become our own. He is respected and admired by the most enlightened reader; he is the guide and philosopher of the ordinary reader, to whose mind, on all the topics connected with our history, he entirely gives the tone and the law. On every account, therefore, I shall dedicate the remainder of this lecture chiefly to the consideration of his work, that your confidence may not be given too implicitly, and that while you feel, as you ought to do, the charm of his composition, the charm of what Gibbon called so justly his careless and inimitable beauties, you may be aware also of the objections that certainly exist to the general tendency and practical effect of his representations. . . . It is understood, indeed, by every reader—it has been proclaimed by many writers—that Hume always inclines to the side of prerogative; that, in his account of the Stuarts, his History is little better than an apology; his pages are therefore read, in this part of his work at least, with something of distrust, and his representations are not considered as decisive."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.; Lect. V.

"Had he written without any such views, [predilections for the Stuarts and the Tories,] he might have attained to an eminence far beyond that which he has reached, and descended to posterity not as the first of all party writers of history, but as the author of a truly great natural work, the spirit and excellence of which should have been equally admired and appreciated by all the English."—FREDERICK SCHLOSSER: Lects. on History of Lit.

"No one can be surprised if in so short a time allotted to the whole work far more attention was given to the composition of the narrative than to the preparation of the materials. It was altogether impossible that in so short a period the duty of the historian should be diligently performed. The execution of the work answers to the mode of its performance."

"But, if the History be not diligently prepared, is it faithfully written? There are numberless proofs of the contrary; but we have the most express evidence in the author's own statement to prove this position."—Lord Brougham's Life of Hume, in the Lives of Men of Letters of the Time of George III., Lon. and Glas., 1856, 182-183.

One of the most eminent of our modern historians considers that he has caught Hume tripping in the reflection quoted below:

"It is observed by Mr. Hume, that actions at sea are seldom if ever so decisive as those on land: a remark suggested by the repeated indecisive actions between the English and Dutch in the reign of Charles II., but which affords a striking proof of the danger of generalising from too limited a collection of facts. Had he extended his retrospect farther, he would have observed that the most decisive and important of all actions recorded in history have been fought at sea."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1789-1815, N. York, 1856, ii. 340-341.

See ante, p. 916, and see Alison's Essays, Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 78.

The same distinguished authority joins in the general commendation of the charms of Hume's style:

"The immortal narrative of Hume. . . . Hume, whose simple but profound history will be coeval with the long and eventful thread of English story."—Hist. of Europe, 1789-1851, i. 161; 1815-52, iii. 361.

We entirely coincide with this assertion: Hume will always be read, in spite of his carelessness, in spite of his errors, and even in spite of his perversions. Nine readers seek amusement where one seeks instruction, and even the tenth man will not neglect Hume; nor can he safely be neglected.

"The accuracy of Hume," remarks an eminent legal authority of America, "in respect of the two first princes of the house of Stuart, has been severely attacked by G. Stuart, Whitaker, Brodie, and others; but his charming style, his profound sagacity, and his philosophical reflections, clothe his great work with irresistible attractions."—CHANCELLOR KENT.

"It is, I submit," says Dr. Dibdin, "in the reign of ELIZABETH that the true genius of Hume may be said to shine forth. Here we have pathos and argument, vigorous delineation of character and statesmanlike views of policy: but the reign of Elizabeth was worthy of the exercise of such talents."—Lit. Comp., ed. 1825, 244-245.

Dr. Johnson, certainly no admirer of Hume in any of his characters save that of a story, evinced his usual contempt of popular opinions by declaring against the much-lauded style of the historian:

"The conversation now turned upon Mr. David Hume's style. JOHNSON. 'Why, sir, his style is not English; the structure of his sentences is French. Now, the French structure and the English structure may in the nature of things be equally good. But if you allow that the English language is established, he is wrong. My name might originally have been Nicholson as well as Johnson; but were you to call me Nicholson now, you would call me very absurdly.'"—Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. Lon., 1847, 150.

This quotation may remind the reader of the criticism of a celebrated reviewer of our own day. Commenting on the literature of "the reigns of the first two Georges, and the greater part of that which ensued," Lord Jeffrey remarks: "The name of Hume is by far the most considerable which occurs in the period to which we have alluded. But, though his thinking was English, his style is entirely French; and, being naturally of a cold fancy, there is nothing of that eloquence or richness about him which characterises the writings of Taylor, and Hooker, and Bacon, and continues, with less weight of matter, to please in those of Cowley and Clarendon."—Review of the Works of Swift, in Edin. Rev., Sept. 1816, and in Contrib. to Edin. Rev., Lon., 1853, 77.

Prof. Smyth's reflections in his 22d Lecture upon the Reign of William III. will be cordially endorsed by the vast majority of historical students:

"And now, when we enter upon the reign of William, we have no longer the assistance of the philosophic Hume. We have no longer within our reach those penetrating observations, those careless and inimitable beauties, which were so justly the delight of Gibbon, and, with whatever prejudices they may be accompanied, and, however suspicious may be those representations which they sometimes enforce and adorn, still render the loss of his pages a subject of the greatest regret, and leave a void which it is impossible adequately to supply."—Lects. on Mod. Hist.

"The triumvirate of British historians, Hume, Robertson, and Gibbon, who exemplified in their very dissimilar styles, the triple contrast and harmony of simplicity, elegance, and splendour."—JAMES MONTGOMERY: Lects. on Mod. Eng. Lit.

We extract the following lines from Gibbon's Autobiography, as furnishing, in connexion with the preceding quotation, a curious instance of coincidence:

"The candour of Dr. Robertson embraced his disciple. A letter from Mr. Hume overpaid the labour of ten years; but I have never presumed to accept a place in the triumvirate of British historians."

Gibbon's epigrammatic description of the style of the two historians with whom his name is so often associated has been already referred to more than once, and may here be properly quoted:

"The perfect composition, the nervous language, the well-turned periods of Dr. Robertson, inflamed me to the ambitious hope that I might one day tread in his footsteps; the calm philosophy, the careless inimitable beauties of his friend and rival, often forced me to close the volume with a mixed sensation of delight and despair."—Ubi supra.

Comparisons, well worthy of perusal, between the histories of Gibbon, Robertson, and Hume, will be found in Schlosser's History of the 18th Century, in Frederick Schlegel's Lects. on the History of Literature, and (by Wm. Gifford) in the London Quarterly Review, vol. xii. 369-375. These critiques we had intended to quote in this article, but we have already transcended our limits. We may remark, in brief, that Schlegel and Gifford, without the least hesitation, assign the priority in merit to Hume; and Schlosser seems inclined to award a similar judgment. In our life of THOMAS CARTY, (p. 247,) we have indicated the source to which Hume was perhaps principally indebted for what the lawyers would call the "learning of his history."

Whilst it is deeply to be regretted that Hume's literary vanity and unphilosophical thirst after notoriety so often betrayed him into speculations whose practical effect is to eradicate the first principles and the last hopes of morality and religion, we are pleased to be able to quote, for the encouragement of our studious readers, a reflection which has doubtless stimulated many to days and nights of mental labour and intellectual toil:

"Such a superiority do the pursuits of literature possess above every other occupation, that even he who attains but a mediocrity in them merits the pre-eminence above those that excel the most in the common and vulgar professions."—History of England: Reign of James I.

He pub. a number of sermons, treatises against Campanian the Jesuit, and other works, 1558-88, for an account of which see Athen. Oxon. See also Fuller's Abel Redivivus; Stryper's Cranmer; Stryper's Parker.

"Humphrey was a great and general scholar, an able Haguel, a deep divine; and for his excellence of style, exactness of method, and substance of matter in his writings, went beyond most of our theologians."—Woot.

"Dr. Humphrey had read more fathers than Campanian the Jesuit ever saw; devoured more than he ever tasted; and taught more in the University of Oxford, than he had either learned or heard."—Archbishop Thomas MATTHEW.

Humphreys, David, LL.D., 1753–1818, a native of Derby, Connecticut, a colonel in the American Revolutionary Army, aide-de-camp to General Washington, and a member of his family, graduated at Yale College in 1771. He served his country in various political capacities, both at home and abroad, and employed his pen as well as his sword in the promotion of her liberties. His principal poetical productions are An Address to the Armies of the United States, 1772; a Poem on the Happiness of America; The Widow of Malabar, a Tragedy; and a Poem on Agriculture. He assisted Trumbull, Barlow, and Hopkins in the composition of The Anarchiad, and wrote a life of General Putnam, pub. in Humphrey's Miscellaneous Works, N. York, 1790 and 1804, 8vo. This biography, enlarged, with an Appendix, Notes, and an Account of Bunker Hill Battle, was republ. Bost., 1818, 8vo, by S. Swett. A biographical account of Mr. Hunt will be found in the Lon. Gent. Mag., Jan. 1855.

Hunt, Freeman, 1804–1858, widely known as proprietor and editor of The Merchants' Magazine, was a native of Quincy, Mass. Whilst a resident of Boston, he established The Ladies' Magazine, The Weekly Traveller, and The Juvenile Miscellany, and also gave to the world Anecdotes and Sketches Illustrative of Female Character; and (in 1830, 2 vols. 12mo) American Anecdotes, Original and Selected.

"The best-known collection of American anecdotes."—N. P. Willis: N. York Mirror.

In 1831 Mr. Hunt removed to the city of New York, where he continued to reside until his death. His first enterprise in this city was a periodical entitled The Traveller, to the columns of which he contributed a series of entertaining sketches of travel, which were afterwards collected and pub. under the title of Letters about the Hudson and its Vicinity. This vol. was reviewed with great favour, and passed through three editions.

In 1839 Mr. Hunt determined to supply a great want in the literary and commercial world; and in July of that year he issued the first number of his famous Merchants' Magazine, which now presents in its thirty-eight well-filled vols. a most valuable library of Commercial Literature. For the energy, perseverance, and talent successfully developed in this important enterprise, Mr. Hunt deserves more praise than we have time or space to afford him. We shall, however, quote some more valuable opinions than our own at the conclusion of this article.

In 1845 Mr. Hunt pub. the first vol. of The Library of Commerce, and in 1856 appeared the first vol., and in 1857 the second vol., of Lives of American Merchants, and Wealth and Worth, a Collection of Morals, Maxims, and Miscellanies for Merchants. It has been well remarked that "The titles as well as topics of these works show the concentration of purpose with which Mr. Hunt gives himself to his chosen field of literary labour."

The subject of our notice was elected a member of numerous statistical and literary societies, and received the degree of A.M. from Harvard University. Other notices of Mr. Hunt and his useful publications will be found in Poe's Literati, N. York, 1850, 50–52; Bungay's Off-Hand Takings, or Crayon Sketches of the Noticeable Men of our Age, 1854, 368–371; N. Amer. Rev., July, 1856, 232–233. The wise merchants (members of a profession to which authentic information is of peculiar value) will need no solicitation of ours to induce them to peruse and re-peruse Mr. Hunt's invaluable vols.; but, as regards the Merchants' Magazine, we shall (to use a mercantile phrase) offer satisfactory endorsements of our own cordial commendation.

"It collects and arranges in good order a large amount of valuable statistical and other information, highly useful, not only to the merchant, but to the statesman, to the cultivator of the earth, to the manufacturer, to the mariner, in short to all classes of the business and reading community."—HENRY CLAY: Ashland, 29th July, 1849.

"I regard it as being, beyond all doubt, among the most valuable periodicals of the times."—DANIEL WAZERER: Washington, March 18, 1861.

"I have found it most useful to me in my senatorial labours, and have been in the habit for many years of carefully consulting it."—THOMAS H. BARTON: Washington City, April 20, 1849.

"It is a grand repository of useful facts and information, which can be found nowhere so well digested and so accessible as in these numbers."—MILLARD FILLMORE.

"Mr. Hunt ought especially to be the man whom the merchants of America delight to honour. It seems strange that we have no similar publication in this country, and yet we have all the raw materials for it in great abundance. We want only a Freeman Hunt."—JAMES WILLIAM GILBERT, General Manager of the London and Westminster Bank, and the author of a Practical Treatise on Banking, &c.

Hunt, James Henry Leigh, b. October 19, 1784, at Southgate, Middlesex, was the son of the Rev. Isaac Hunt (ante) and Miss Mary Shewell, the daughter of Stephen Shewell, a merchant of Philadelphia. An aunt of this lady's was the wife of Benjamin West, the eminent American painter. Young Hunt commenced authorship at an early period, and, when the poet was only about sixteen years of age, his verses were collected by his father and pub., with a large list of subscribers, under the title of Juvenilia; or, Poems written between the ages of Twelve and Sixteen, Lon., 1801, 12mo.

"I was as proud perhaps of the book at that time, as I am ashamed of it now. . . . My book was a heap of imitations, all but absolutely worthless."—Leigh Hunt's Autobiography.

These effusions were given to the world shortly after their author's departure from Christ Hospital, where, like Coleridge, Lamb, and many others who afterwards attained distinction, he received his early education. After some experience as an attorney's clerk, and in the duties connected with a post in the War Office, Hunt united in 1808 with his brother John in the establishment of a weekly paper entitled The Examiner, which periodical, owing to Leigh's able editorship, soon acquired great popularity.

Doubtless the practice which he had cultivated in very early life as theatrical critic for the "News" now proved of great advantage to the young editor. Having thus beheld him fairly launched upon that life of literary activity for which he has been so distinguished for the last half-century, we must refer to his piquant Autobiography for further particulars of his career, whilst we devote the limited space to which we are restricted to a catalogue of his works, and the citation of some opinions upon their merits.

His translations of Redi's Bacco in Toscana, the Lutrin of Boileau, the Amyntas of Tasso, and of other pieces, have elicited warm commendation, whilst the last-named at least has not escaped without censure. Since 1847 Mr. Hunt has been in receipt of a pension of £200 per annum. Many of Hunt's works have been repub. in America by Wells & Lilly, Carey, Lea & Blanchard, Carey & Hart, Wiley & Putnam, the Harpers, W. P. Hazard, Ticknor & Fields, &c. From the many opinions before us respecting the characteristics of this voluminous and popular author, we can find room for a few brief extracts only.

LEIGH HUNT AS A POET.

"With acute powers of conception, a sparkling and lively fancy, and a quaintly-curious felicity of diction, the grand characteristic of Leigh Hunt's poetry is word-painting; and in this he is probably without a rival, save in the last and best productions of Keats, who contended, not vainly, with his master on that ground. In this respect, nothing can be more remarkable than some passages in Rimini, and in his collection entitled Pollage, much of which he has since capriciously cancelled; and he also exercised this peculiar faculty most felicitously in translations from the French and Italian, although in some instances he carried it to the amount of grotesqueness or affectation. His heroic couplet has much of the life, strength, and flexibility of Dryden—of whom he often reminds us; and in it he follows glorious John, even to his love for triplets and Alexandrines."—Moir's Sketches of the Post. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

"The days are happily past when the paltry epithet of 'Cockney Poets' could be bestowed on Keats and Leigh Hunt: the world has outlived them. People would as soon think of applying such a word to Dr. Johnson. Happily, too, one of the delightful writers who were the objects of these unworthy attacks has outlived them also; has lived to attain a popularity of the most genial kind, and to diffuse through a thousand pleasant channels many of the finest parts of our finest writers. He has done good service to literature in another way, by enriching our language with some of the very best translations since Cowley. Who ever thought to see Tasso's famous passage in Aminta so rendered? [Ode to the Golden Age here quoted.] Who, again, ever hoped to see such an English version of one of Petrarch's most characteristic poems, conceits and all? [Petrarch's Contemplations of Death in the Bower of Laura here quoted.]

"In justice to Mr. Leigh Hunt, I add to these fine translations, of which every lover of Italian literature will perceive the merit, some extracts from his original poems, which need no previous preparation in the reader. Except Chaucer himself, no painter of professions has excelled the entrance of Paolo to Ravenna, in the story of Rimini."—Miss Mitford's Recollections of a Literary Life.

"At the outset of his career, his ambition was to excel as a bard. His principal success, however, seems chiefly to lay in a certain vein of essay-writing, in which fancy and familiarity are delightfully combined. Still he has woven many rhymes that are not only sweet and cheerful, but possess a peculiar grace and merit of their own, besides illustrating some capital ideas relative to poetical diction and influence. They are, to be sure, deformed by some offences against the dignity of the muse, in the shape of affectations and far-fetched conceits."—Tuckerman's Thoughts on the Poets.

Mr. Tuckerman here quotes some most objectionable epithets used by the poet, in which citation he reminds us—though his selection is entirely different—of Lord Jeffrey's excerpts from Rimini.

"What can be said," exclaims the terrible Scotch reviewer, "for such lines as 'She had stout notions on the marrying score,' or, 'He kept no reckoning with his sweets or sour,' or, 'And better still—in my idea at least,' or, 'The two divinest things this world has got.'

"We see no sort of beauty in such absurd and unusual phrases as 'a dillipone waist,' 'a 'scattery light,' or 'flings of sunshine,'—nor any charm in such comparatives as 'martillar,' or 'tastofuller,' or 'franklar,' or in such words as 'whicks,' and 'swalling,' and 'freaks and snatches,' and an hundred others in the same taste."—Edin. Rev., xxvi. 491. Mr. Gifford cites many other instances very much of the same character. See No. 36, ante.

"In spite of his faults, there is something quite bewitching in his character and poems. We hardly judge him by the same laws we apply to other poets; we are willing to take him as he is. The same errors and foibles which would be insufferable in another alter their aspect, if not their nature, as observed in the easy impudence of his chirping egotism. . . . There is every reason to suppose that his poems will long survive the life of their author and the reputation of the majority of his assailants."—Whipple's Essays and Reviews.

"Leigh Hunt, most vivid of poets and most cordial of critics."—JOHN WILSON: Recreations of Christopher North.

LEIGH HUNT AS A PROSE-WRITER.

"To my taste, the Author of Rimini and Editor of the Examiner is among the best and least-corrupted of our poetical prose-writers. In his light but well-supported columns we find the raciness, the sharpness, and the sparkling effect of poetry, with little that is extravagant or far-fetched, and no turgidity or pompous pretension. Perhaps there is too much the appearance of relaxation and trifling, (as if he had escaped the shackles of rhyme,) a caprice, a levity, and a disposition to innovate in words and ideas. Still the genuine master-spirit of the prose-writer is there; the tone of lively, sensible conversation; and this may in part arise from the author's being himself an animated talker. Mr. Hunt wants something of the heat and earnestness of the political partisan; but his familiar and miscellaneous papers have all the ease, grace, and point of the best style of Essay-writing. Many of his effusions in the Indicator show, that if he had devoted himself exclusively to that mode of writing, he inherits more of the spirit of Steele than any man since his time."—Haslitt's Table-Talk: on the Prose Style of Poets.

"He is, in truth, one of the pleasantest writers of his time,—easy, colloquial, genial, humane, full of fine fancies and verbal knictries, possessing a loving if not a 'learned spirit'; with hardly a spice of bitterness in his composition. . . . His Imagination and Fancy is a delightful book. The Indicator and Star are filled with essays of peculiar excellence."—Whipple's Essays and Reviews.

"His prose is gossiping, graceful, and searching, and charms many readers."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

In a review of Hunt's edit. of The Dramatic Works of Wycherley, Congreve, and Farquhar, (1840, 8vo,) an eminent authority thus speaks of the editor in the capacity of a critic:

"In some respects Mr. Leigh Hunt is excellently qualified for the task which he has undertaken. His style, in spite of its mannerism, nay, partly by reason of its mannerism, is well suited for light, garrulous, desultory area, half critical, half biographical. We do not always agree with his literary judgments; but we find in him what is very rare in our time, the power of justly appreciating and heartily enjoying good things of very different kinds. He can adore Shakespeare and Spenser without denying poetical genius to the author of Alexander's Feast, or fine observation, rich fancy, and exquisite humour to him who imagined Will Honeycomb and Sir Roger de Coverley. He has paid particular attention to the history of the English drama from the Age of Elizabeth down to our time, and has every right to be heard with respect on that subject."—T. B. Hunter, John, 1728-1793, the distinguished anatomist and surgeon, was a native of Long Calderwood, near Glasgow, the son of a farmer, and the youngest of ten children. His early education was very defective, as he preferred amusement to the studies of the grammar-school which he occasionally attended. After working as a cabinet-maker's apprentice in Glasgow for about three years, he was induced in his twenty-first year, by the medical reputation of his brother William, in London, to offer himself as his assistant. He arrived in London in 1748, studied anatomy with his brother, and surgery under Cheselden, and, by the distinction which he rapidly acquired and continued to augment, gave evidence that he had found his proper sphere of action. 1. *Nat. Huntington, William, S.S., 1744-1813, for many years a popular Calvinist Methodist preacher in London, originally a labourer, pub. many serms. and theolog. treatises, some controversial, others experimental.

His works were pub. in 1820, 20 vols. 8vo, £12. Select Works, edited by his son, Ebenezer Huntington, 1838, 6 vols. 8vo. New ed. of his Works, 1856, 6 vols. demy 8vo, £2 2s. The last edit. is pub. by W. H. Collingridge, Lon., who sells many of the different works separately. This edit. contains about fifty works "carefully printed from Mr. Bensley's edition, without the least abridgment, at about one-sixth of the original price." Bensley's edit. is the one above noticed in 20 vols., pub. at £12. Two vols. of Huntington's Letters were pub. in 1851. The title S.S. has doubtless puzzled many. We give the bearer's own explanation:

"As I cannot get a D.D. for the want of cash, neither can I get at M.A. for want of learning; therefore I am compelled to fly for refuge to S.S., by which I mean Sinner Saved."

Hurd, Richard, D.D., 1720–1808, a native of Congreve, Staffordshire, admitted of Emanuel Coll., Camb., 1733; one of the Whitehall Preachers, 1750; Rector of Thurcaston, 1757; Rector of Yorkton, Yorkshire, 1762; Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, 1765; Archdeacon of Gloucester, 1767; Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, 1775; trans. to Worcester, 1781; declined the Archbishopric of Canterbury, 1783. His principal works are the following:—1. Commentary on Horace's Ars Poetica, 1749; 4th ed., 1763, 3 vols. 8vo. New ed., 1776. George Colman overthrew Hurd's Hypothesis, and Hurd admitted that Colman was right. See COLMAN, GEORGE, the elder. See Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, iii. 94, 509; Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., 1810, 41, 218. The eulogy lavished by Hurd, in this Commentary, on Warburton, gained him the friendship of that prelate. 2. Comment. on Horace's Epistola ad Augustum; with a Discourse on Poetical Imitation, 1751. Warburton considered this Commentary "one of the most masterly pieces of criticism ever written."

"Hurd extracts an order and coherence which I am unable to recognise in the original."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., pp. 40, 120.

3. Dialogues on Sincerity, Retirement, the Golden Age of Elizabeth, and the Constitution of the English Government, 1759, 8vo. Anon. Repub. along with his Letters on Chivalry and Romance, (pub. 1762, 8vo.), and Dialogues on Foreign Travel, (pub. 1764, 8vo.), under the title of Dialogues, Moral and Political, 1765, 3 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1771, 3 vols. sm. 8vo. Again, 1788, 3 vols. 8vo. The first ed. (1759) contains some passages which were omitted in the subsequent edit.; but see Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., p. 71.

"Dr. Hurd, it is well known, published, at one time of his life, Moral and Political Dialogues, with a woful Whiggish cast."—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

"There is a dialogue by Dr. Hurd on the times and personal qualities of Elizabeth, which is not long, and well worth reading, where her character is very severely criticized."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.

"I have now seen the whole of the Letters on Chivalry, and am wonderfully taken with them. They cannot but please all persons of taste greatly. They are the petit-places to that noble work, the Dialogues, in which there is all the correctness of Addison's style, and a strength of reasoning under the direction of judgment far superior. The author is one of the best scholars in the kingdom, and of parts and genius equal to his learning, and a moral character that adorns both."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

"After all, there is something offensive to correct feeling and just taste in thus imputing fictitious conversations to real personages; and, though Mr. Hurd has executed his task with delicacy and address, I cannot help thinking that he has set a mischievous example."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., p. 69.

"Hurd has perhaps the merit of being the first who in this country aimed at philosophical criticism: he had great ingenuity, a good deal of reading, and a facility in applying it; but he did not feel very deeply, was somewhat of a coxcomb, and having always before his eyes a model neither good in itself nor made for him to emulate, he assumes a dogmatic arrogance, which, as it always offends the reader, so for the most part stands in the way of the author's own search for truth."—*Hallam's Lit. Hurriem, John, 1675?-1731, a Congregational minister at Denton, Norfolk, and subsequently in Hare Court, London, was the author of some excellent sermons and theological treatises, the best-known of which is that on the Holy Spirit, (in XVI. Serms. at Pinner's Hall), 1734, 8vo. An edit. of his Discourses was pub. in 1727, 3 vols. 8vo; and his Whole Works, now first collected, with a Life, appeared in 1823, 3 vols. 12mo. There have been also new edits. of several of his works.

Hutcheson, Archibald, d. 1740, pub. several works on politics, political economy, &c., the most important of which is the Collec. of Treatises relating to the National Debts and Funds, Lon., 1721, 75, 2 vols. fol. Hutcheson suggested a mode of paying off the public debt, for an account of which see Hume's Essay on Public Credit; McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 319; Blackw. Mag., xliii. 345.

Hutcheson, C. Southern Mariners, a Tale of Patagonia; a Poem, Lon., 1853, 12mo.

Hutcheson, Francis, 1694-1747, a native of the North of Ireland, where his father was a Presbyterian minister, entered the University of Glasgow in 1710, studied divinity, and was licensed to preach. When about to assume the pastoral charge of a small Presbyterian congregation in the North of England, he was persuaded to open an academy in Dublin, which was liberally encouraged. In 1729 he became Professor of Moral Philosophy in the Univ. of Dublin. In 1726 he pub. An Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, and in 1728 an Essay on the Passions and Affections. He also pub. some manuals for his class, &c. His great work—A System of Moral Philosophy, with the Life, Writings, and Character of the Author, by Dr. Wm. Leechman—was pub. by his son, Francis Hutcheson, M.D., in 1755, Glasgow, 2 vols. 4to. His Letters on Virtue appeared in 1772, 8vo. Hutcheson is a warm advocate of the doctrine of an implanted moral sense, intended as a governing principle in the conduct of human actions. He undoubtedly did much to increase—he may almost be said to have established—the school of Shaftesbury and Butler in Scotland. At this we need not marvel, when we read the glowing tribute paid to his philosophical orations by an eminent authority of our own day:

"His Lectures, by their copious illustrations, their amiable tone of feeling, their enlightened views of liberty and human improvement, and their persuasive eloquence, made a deeper impression than the more severe and dry compositions of Butler could ever create, and laid the foundation in Scotland of the modern ethical school."—LORD BROUGHAM: Lives of Philosophers of the Time of Geo. III., art. Adam Smith, ed. 1865, 166.

Butler and Hutcheson coincided in the two important positions, that disinterested affections, and a distinct moral faculty, are essential parts of human nature. Hutcheson is a chaste and simple writer, who imbibed the opinions without the literary faults of his master, Shaftesbury. He has a clearness of expression and fulness of illustration which are wanting in Butler. But he is inferior to both these writers in the appearance at least of originality, and to Butler especially in that philosophical courage which, when it discovers the fountains of truth and falsehood, leaves others to follow the streams. . . . Hutcheson was the father of the modern school of philosophy in Scotland."—SIR JAMES MACLEOD: Preface. Diet. Encyc. Brit., and in his Works, 1864, i. 127, 129.

But the honour assigned to Hutcheson in the last paragraph cannot pass unchallenged. This distinction is

Hutchinson, Thomas, 1711-1780, graduated at Harvard College, 1727; Chief-Justice of the Province of Massachusetts, 1760; Lieutenant-Governor, 1758-71; Governor, 1771-74. He was superseded by General Gage, May 13, 1774, and on the first of the following month sailed for England, where he was in the receipt of a pension until his death at Brompton, June 3, 1780. He was very unpopular in Massachusetts on account of his opposition to the principles of American liberty; and his disgrace was completed by the publication of some of his private letters, of the same tendency, to an ex-member of the British Parliament. These, with some others, were discovered in England by Benjamin Franklin, and by him sent back to Massachusetts to Dr. Cooper, with an injunction that they should not be copied nor published. 1. Hutton, James, M.D., 1726-1797, called the author of the Plutonian Theory of Geology, a native of Edinburgh, took his medical degree at Leyden in 1749. On his return home he became a zealous student of agriculture and geology, and gave the first-fruits of his researches to the world in 1777, under the title of Considerations on the Nature, Quality, and Distinctions of Coal and Culm, Edin., 8vo. In 1792 he pub. Dissertations on different subjects in Natural Philosophy, 4to; in 1794, Dissertation upon the Philosophy of Light, Heat, and Fire, 8vo; in the same year, An Investigation of the Principles of Knowledge, and of the Progress of Reason from Sense to Science and Philosophy, 3 vols. 4to; and in 1795, Theory of the Earth, with Proofs and Illustrations, 3 vols. 8vo. This is a collection, with additions, of his papers on this subject in the Edin. Phil. Trans. His theory, as communicated in the above papers, had been warmly attacked by Dr. Kirwan, in the Memoirs of the Irish Academy. The day that Hutton read Kirwan's attack he commenced the preparation of the MS. of the above two vols. for the press. Professor John Playfair zealously espoused Hutton's cause, and pub. in 1802, 8vo, Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth. This work was reviewed in the same year by Dr. John Murray, in A Comparative View of the Huttonian and Neptunian Systems of Geo- logy, in Answer to the Illustrations, &c. In the hands of Professor Playfair we may safely leave the scientific reputation of Dr. Hutton. Hutton, William, 1723-1815, a bookseller of Birmingham, rose by perseverance and industry from poverty to affluence. In his last work—A Trip to Coatham—written in his eighty-sixth year, he tells us—

"I took up my pen, and that with fear and trembling, at the advanced age of fifty-six, a period when most would lay it down. I drove the quill thirty years, during which time I wrote and published thirty books."

His works were originally pub. from 1782 to 1810. A collective ed. of his Works was pub. in 1817, in 8 vols. 8vo, consisting of—Vol. I. His Life, written by himself; Journey to London; 2d edition. II. History of Birmingham. III. Courts of Requests, and Dissertation on Juries and Hundred Court. IV. Battle of Bosworth Field; 2d edit., with Additions by Nichols. V. History of Derby; Description of Blackpool. VI. History of the Roman Wall. VII. Remarks on North Wales; Tour to Scarborough, with A Survey of York. VIII. Trip to Coatham.

He also pub. The Barbers; a Poem, 1793, 8vo; Edgar and Elfrida; a Poem, 1794, 8vo. There has been a new ed. of his Poems, chiefly Tales, 8vo; and, since the collective ed. of his Works was pub., there have been new eds. of the Court of Requests, 1840, 8vo; his Life, by himself, 1841, sq.; Trip to Redcar and Coatham, 1841, 8vo. He was a man of vast erudition, especially in the Eastern tongues, and pub. a number of learned works, and projected many more. Among the best-known of his publications are (1.) Catalogus Impressorum Librorum in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, Oxon., 1674, fol. New ed., chiefly prepared by Thos. Hearne, 1738, 2 vols. fol. New ed., 1843, 3 vols. fol.; vol. iv., 1850. 2. Quatuor Evangelia et Acta Apostolorum, Lingua Malaica, Characteristibus Europæis, Oxf., 1677, 4to. 3. De Ludia Orientalium, Heb. et Lat., libri ii., 1689-94, 8vo. 4. Veterum Persarum et Medorum Religionis eorumque Magorum Historia, 1700, 4to; 2d ed., 1706, 4to. Best ed., 1760, 4to.

"The variety and novelty of its contents gave this book a credit which in some degree it preserves; but Hyde was ignorant of the ancient language of Persia, and is said to have been often misled by Mohammedan authorities. The vast increase of Oriental information in modern times renders it difficult for any work of the seventeenth century to keep its ground."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

Inchbald, Mrs. Elizabeth, 1756-1821, a celebrated actress, dramatist, and novelist, a native of Stanningfield, Suffolk, where her father, Mr. Simpson, was a farmer, came to London at the age of sixteen to seek an engagement on the stage, and married Mr. Inchbald, an actor of some reputation. The beautiful Mrs. Inchbald seems to have trod the boards with unbounded applause from her first appearance on the stage until her retirement in 1789. From this period she supported herself by her literary labours, which had commenced as early as 1781, although her Comedy then written—"I'll Tell You What"—was not performed until 1785. The first piece of her composition which was played was the Farce of A Mogul Tale; or, The Descent of the Balloon, which came out in 1784 at the Haymarket Theatre. The following is a list of her dramas: 1. A Mogul Tale; Farce, 1784. Not printed. 2. Appearance is against them; Farce, 1785, 8vo. 3. I'll Tell You What; Com., 1786, 8vo. 4. Widow's Vow; Farce, 1786, 8vo. 5. All on a Summer's Day; Com., 1787. Not printed. 6. Animal Magnetism; Farce, 1788. Not printed. 7. The Child of Nature; Dram. Piece, 1788, 8vo. 8. Midnight Hour; Com., 1788, 8vo. 9. Such Things Are; Play, 1788, 8vo. 10. Married Man; Com., 1789, 8vo. 11. The Hue and Cry; Farce, 1791. Not printed. 12. Next-Door Neighbours; Com., 1791, 8vo. 13. Young Men and Old Women; Farce. Not printed. 14. Every one has his faults; Com., 1793, 8vo. 15. The Wedding Day; Com., 1794, 8vo. 16. Wives as they were, and Maids as they are; Com., 1797, 8vo. 17. Lovers' Vows; Play, 1798, 8vo. 18. Wise Man of the East; Play, 1799, 8vo. 19. To Marry or not to Marry; Com., 1805, 8vo. Mrs. Inchbald also edited a Collection of Plays, (The British Theatre), with Biographical and Critical Remarks, 25 vols., 1806-09; a Collection of Farces and other After-pieces, in 7 vols. 12mo, 1809; and the Modern Theatre, 10 vols. 12mo, 1809. But it is by her novels—A Simple Story, 1791, 4 vols. 12mo, and Nature and Art, 1796, 2 vols. 12mo—that this excellent woman is best known to the reading-world at large. A notice of each of these works from eminent critics is all for which we can find space:

"I have just been reading for the third, I believe for the fourth, time, The Simple Story. Its effect upon my feelings was as powerful as at the first reading: I never read any novel—I except none.—I never read any novel that affected me so strongly, or that so completely possessed me with the belief in the real existence of all the persons it represents. I never once recollected the author whilst I was reading it; never said or thought, that's a fine sentiment,—or, that is well expressed,—or, that is well invented; I believed all to be real, and was affected as I should be by the real scenes, if they had passed before my eyes: it is truly and deeply pathetic."—MARIA EDGEMOND.

"If Mrs. Radcliffe touched the trembling chords of the imagination, making wild music there, Mrs. Inchbald has no less power over the spring of the heart. She not only moves the affections, but melts us into 'all the luxury of woe.' Her Nature and Art is one of the most interesting and pathetic stories in the world. It is indeed too much so; the distress is too naked, and the situations hardly to be borne with patience."—HARLETT: On the English Novels.

Mrs. Inchbald had prepared four vols. of autobiography phical reminiscences, for which she was offered £1000 by Sir Richard Phillips, the publisher; but, acting by the advice of her spiritual guide, Dr. Poynter, she destroyed the MS. In 1833, however, Mr. Boaden pub. Memoirs of Mrs. Inchbald, compiled from an autograph journal which she had kept for above half a century. Of these Memoirs a review, accompanied by copious extracts, will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag., 1833, Pt. 2, 240-243, 332-336. A biographical notice of Mrs. Inchbald, pub. at the time of her death, will be found in the same periodical, 1821, Pt. 2, 184-185, 648. Ingersoll, C. M. English Grammar, Phila.

Ingersoll, Charles Jared, a member of the Philadelphia Bar, b. Oct. 3, 1782, at Philadelphia, is a son of Jared Ingersoll, of Philadelphia, and a grandson of Jared Ingersoll, of Connecticut, Stamp Commissioner. The subject of our notice was elected a member of the National House of Representatives in 1812, and has, until within the last seven or eight years, been actively engaged in public life in various capacities. His principal literary productions are the following:

About 1800, a poem, called Chiomara, published in the Port-Folio, edited by Joseph Dennie. 1801. A tragedy, in five acts, called Edwy and Elgiva, performed at the theatre, Chestnut Street. 1808. A pamphlet on the international disputes, called the Rights and Wrongs, Power and Policy, of the United States of America. 1810. A volume entitled Inchiquin the Jesuit's Letters on American literature and politics. Reviewed in the Lon. Quar. Rev., x. 494-539. See also Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 50. The review in the London Quarterly was answered by James K. Paulding, in his United States and England, pub. in 1814. 1811-15. Numerous contributions, anonymous, to the Democratic Press, Phila., and National Intelligencer, Washington, on the controversies with England which produced the war declared in 1812. 1813-15. Several Speeches, published in pamphlets, as member of Congress, concerning that war. 1823. Discourse before the American Philosophical Society on the influence of America on the mind. Republished in England and France. 1827. The Address of the Assembly of friends of domestic manufactures at Harrisburg; and (1829) moet of the address of the National Assembly on that subject at New York. Translation of a French Work on the freedom of navigation and commerce of neutral nations in time of war, vindicating the law of nations that free ships make free goods; published in the American Law Journal. 1830. Review of Bourrienne's Memoirs, in American Quarterly Review. 1831. A dramatic tragic poem, in five acts, called Julian. 1838. Article on the Supreme Court of the United States, its Judges and jurisdiction, in the United States Magazine and Democratic Review. 1835. A pamphlet entitled View of River-Rights. 1837. In the Convention to reform the Constitution of Pennsylvania, Reports on Currency, Speeches, published in pamphlets, on the Judiciary and Legislative power over bank-charters. 1841-42, '44-48. Reports and Speeches in Congress, published in pamphlets, on Tariff, Bank, Mexico, Texas, and Oregon. Many Discourses and Orations, published in pamphlets, on various subjects, literary and political. 1845-52. History of the War of 1812-15, between Great Britain and the United States: in four vo-lunes. Vols. i. and ii. were reviewed in the Lon. Athenæum, 1853, 103-104.

"The quotations that we have made suggest a concluding remark as to Mr. Ingersoll's style. It is a rough, energetic style, not deficient in happy and vivid expressions; but we have rarely met with American writing more contemptuous not only of English rules, but of the reader's respiratory conveniences. . . . The book is hard to read because of the uncouthness of its forms."—Urb. supra.

Whatever may be the peculiarities of Mr. Ingersoll's style, the public are certainly indebted to him for much valuable information, collected from original sources, and first made known to the world through the medium of these volumes.

For further information concerning Mr. Ingersoll and his literary labours, see Duyekineks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit.; N. Amer. Rev., xviii. 157-178, (by Jared Sparks;) Ibid., xxii. 212-215; Democrat. Rev., (with portrait) vi. 339; Ibid., xvi. 221.

Ingersoll, Jared, 1722-1781, a native of Milford, Conn., graduated at Yale College in 1742, and was appointed Stamp Commissioner in 1766. He was subsequently made Admiralty Judge for the Middle District, and resided some time in Philadelphia, but returned to New Haven, where he died in August, 1781. He was present at the debate on the Stamp-Act, and on his return home pub. a pamphlet on the subject, (New Haven, 1766, 4to.), which is now very rare, and has even escaped the researches of Mr. Rich. Extracts from this pamphlet will be found in a review of Lord Mahon's Hist. of England, (by J. G. Palfrey), N. Amer. Rev., lxxv. 141-143.

Ingersoll, Joseph Reed, a member of the Philadelphia Bar, grandson of the preceding, and brother of Charles Jared Ingersoll, (ante), was for many years an influential member of the National House of Representatives. For the last few years he has retired from public life. In addition to a number of printed speeches and addresses, political, literary, and philanthropic, Mr. Ingersoll is favourably known as an author by his translation into English of Roccus's tracts De Navibus et Naulo, and De Asseratione, Phila., 1809, 8vo.

This work is serial. Mr. Ingraham was noted for his love of rare and curious books and prints; and the catalogue of his library, sold in Philadelphia, February, 1856, is well worthy of the attention of the veritable bibliomaniac. A notice of Mr. Ingraham, with a portrait, will be found in the Democratic Review, xxv. 77.

Ingraham, Rev. J. H., new a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, before his ordination pub. a number of romances, among which are The Southwest, Burton, Lafitte, Will Terrill, and Rivington. Ingulphus, a monastic historian, b. in London, about 1030, d. 1109, has long enjoyed the reputation of the authorship of a work on the life and miracles of St. Guthlac, and a History of the Monastery of Croyland, 626-1089. The latter, which embodies many particulars relating to English history, was pub. by Sir Henry Savile, in the Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores post Bedam præcipui, Lon., 1596, fol.; Franc., 1601, fol.; and entire, with Peter of Blois's continuation, (1090-1117,) in the Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores veterum, Oxon., 1684, fol., tom. i. A new ed., edited by Mr. H. T. Riley, has been recently pubn., 1854, p. 8vo, in Bohn's Antiq. Lib., vol. xxix. But, unfortunately for the fame of Ingulphus, it has been proved (by Sir Francis Palgrave first, in the Lon. Quar. Rev., and by Thomas Wright, in Biog. Brit. Lit.) that this history is a forgery. See these authorities, and Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. Lon., 1854, i. 16, and 27, n. In the history it is stated that its reputed author, Ingulphus, also wrote a life of St. Guthlac; but no such book is known to exist, nor is it mentioned by any other authority.

Innes, Louis, a R. Catholic priest, b. about 1650, Principal of the Scotch College at Paris, and Parisian secretary to James II., is said to have written the Memoirs of James II., an abstract from which was used by James STAMER CLARKE (q. v.) in the work pub. by him, entitled The Life of James II., &c. The original memoir, in 4 vols. fol., MS., was destroyed, but a compendium was previously prepared, and it is to this we have reference in the above remark. But see next article.

Innes, Thomas, 1662-1744, a Roman Catholic priest, brother of the preceding, and his successor in the office of Principal of the Scotch College at Paris, was the author of A Critical Essay on the Ancient Inhabitants of the Northern Parts of Britain, in which he attacks with much success the assertions of Fordun's Chronicle, and other histories, respecting the antiquities of Scotland. He is also supposed by some to have been the author of the Memoir of James H. noticed in preceding article. A biographical account of Innes will be found in Chambers and Thomson's Biog. Diet. of Eminent Scotsmen, 1853, iii. 183-187. Innes's Critical Essay was answered by Andrew Waddell, Edin., 1738, 4to, and by Alex. Tait, 1741, 12mo. Both of these answers will be found in vol. i. of Scotia Rediviva, 1826, 8vo. Innes's Critical Essay is a work of great value to the student of Scotch history:

Ireland, William Henry, d. 1834, a son of Samuel Ireland, (ante,) perpetrated in 1795-96 the remarkable Shakespeare Forgeries, which gave his name such infamous notoriety. The plays of Vortigern and Henry the Second, two of the Shakespeare Forgeries, were printed in 1799, 8vo, and Ireland repub. Vortigern, with an original preface and a facsimile of the forgery, in 1832, 8vo. The fol. vol. pub. by S. Ireland, 1796, containing the Miscellaneous Papers, &c., is very rare, as but 138 copies were preserved. See Wilson's Shaksperiana, p. 22. We happen to possess Ireland's own MS. of one of his forgeries,—Henry the Second: the rascal seemed to feel but little penitence for his fraud; for at the conclusion he indulges in the self-gratulatory exclamation, "Hussa! Hussa! Hussa!" In addition to the Shakespeare forgeries, Ireland wrote a number of novels, plays, poems, &c., 1799-1814, a list of which will be found in Watt's Bibl. Brit.

Irving, Edward, 1792-1834, a native of Annan, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, was educated at the University of Edinburgh; Assistant minister to Dr. Chalmers, of St. John's Church, Glasgow, 1819-22; minister of the Scotch Church, Cross Street, Hatton Garden, London, 1822; removed to the large church built for his congregation in Regent's Square, 1829; accused of heresy by the Presbytery of London, 1830; ejected from his church, May 3, 1832. After his ejection, his friends purchased for him the picture-gallery of Benjamin West, in Newman Street, and there Mr. Irving attracted large crowds by his remarkable exhibitions of the "gift of unknown tongues," produced directly, as he believed, by divine inspiration. He died of consumption at Glasgow, December 6, 1834, in the 42d year of his age. He was undoubtedly a sincere and excellent man; but his judgment and prudence were not equal to his piety and devotion, even before the unmistakable evidences of insanity which eventually clouded his fine intellect. He pub.—For the Oracles of God, Four Orations; For Judgment to Come, an Argument in Nine Parts, 3d ed., Lon., 1824, 8vo; Babylon and Infidelity foredoomed of God, 1826, 2 vols. 12mo, reprinted in 1 vol. 8vo; Serms., Lects., and Occasional Discourses, Lon., 1828, 3 vols. 8vo; Homilies on the Sacraments, vol. i., 1828, sm. 8vo; The Last Days, 1828, 8vo, 2d ed., with Life by H. Bonar, 1850, p. 8vo; Expositions of the Book of Revelation, 1831, 4 vols. 12mo; and a number of single serms., theolog. treatises, &c. One of his best productions is his Introduction to Bishop Horne's Comment on the Psalms, already noticed by us in the life of that excellent prelate. Mr. Irving's disciples are by no means extinct, in proof of which a project is now (1856) on foot to build Irvingite chapels in all the large towns of the United Kingdom; and it is reported that one gentleman in London has recently subscribed no less than £100,000 towards this scheme. Irving, G. V. Digest of the Inhabited-House Tax Act, Lon., 1852, 8vo.

Irving, Helen W., is the nom de plume of a very young lady, a resident of Lynn, Massachusetts, who has pub. a number of poetical pieces in The Home Journal and other periodicals. The stanzas entitled Love and Fame have been cited as especially deserving of commendation. See T. B. Read's Female Poets of America; Caroline May's American Female Poets.

Irving, John Treat, 1778-1838, Presiding Judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York from 1817 until his death, and a brother of Washington and Peter Irving, was a contributor to the Morning Chronicle, (started in New York, Oct. 1, 1802,) a Democratic journal, conducted by the last-named of his two brothers. He acquired some distinction by his poetical attacks upon the tenets of his political opponents, and more by the exemplary discharge of the duties connected with his judicial station. See Daly's Hist. of Judic. Trib. of N. York, p. 65.

Irving, John Treat, a member of the New York Bar, son of the preceding, and a nephew of Washington Irving, is best known as an author by his Sketches in an Expedition to the Pawnee Tribes, Phila., 1833, 2 vols. 12mo, Lon., 1835, 2 vols. p. 8vo; The Attorney; a Novel; and Harry Harson, or The Benevolent Bachelor; a Novel. The last two works were originally pub. in the New York Knickerbocker Magazine, under the signature of John Quod.

Irving, L. H. Sketches of Gibraltar, Edin., 1853, ob. fol.

Irving, Peter, 1771-1838, a brother of Washington Irving, pub. at New York, in 1820, a novel entitled Giovanni Sbagarzo; a Venetian Tale, (from the French,) with alterations by Percival G—. Mr. Irving was editor and proprietor of The Morning Chronicle, a Democratic paper, started in New York, Oct. 1, 1802, and co-projector with his brother Washington of the humorous sketches which the latter expanded into the celebrated History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker. Dr. Irving—so called from some attention paid to the study of medicine in early life—resided in Europe from 1809 to '36, and died in about two years after his return to New York.

Irving, Maxwell John. See MAXWELL, JOHN IRVING.

Irving, Theodore, LL.D., b. 1809, in the city of New York, a son of Ebenezer Irving, resided for some years abroad with his uncle, Washington Irving; was from 1836 to '49 Professor of History and Belles-Lettres at Geneva College, and subsequently filled for three years the chair of Belles-Lettres in the Free Academy of New York. In December, 1854, he took holy orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church. In addition to many fugitive essays contributed to the periodicals of the day, Mr. Irving is the author of two valuable works, viz.: 1. The Conquest of Florida, by Hernando de Soto, Phila., 1835, 2 vols. 12mo; Lon., 1835, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Revised ed., uniform with the collective ed. of Washington Irving's Works, N. York, 12mo. Also pub. in vol. x. of H. G. Bohn's collective ed. of Washington Irving's Works, Lon., 1851, 10 vols. 8vo.

"The book before us is a delightful one. . . . In their style, too, these volumes are related to the pure and graceful writing of the author of the Life of Columbus. . . . The history before us is hardly a thing to read or criticize without a spark of the old ballad spirit being lighted within us, and we had better close our notice, lest we be tempted to try the indiscretion of a rhyme."—Lon. Athm., 1835, 609-611.

2. The Fountain of Living Waters; illustrated by Facts, N. York, 1854, 18mo; 4th ed., 1855, 18mo.

"The whole object of the book is to lead erring and wandering souls to Christ. Believing that it is well calculated to accomplish this end, we would commend it as a book to be put into the hands of young persons whose minds are turned more or less to religious themes, and particularly such as need kind and gentle persuaders to piety."—Prot. Epis. Rev. and Church Reg., N. York, April, 1855, 213.

"Living Waters is a sweet and tender appeal in behalf of spiritual religion, addressed especially to the young."—Method. Quar. Rev.

Irving, Thomas. Con. to Med. Com., 1790.

Irving, Washington, one of the most distinguished of modern authors, was born April 3, 1783, in the city of New York, in a house in William Street, between John and Fulton Streets, and not far from that venerable pile the Old Dutch Church. This mansion—so long an object of interest to citizen and sojourner—had until within the last few years resisted the progress of "improvement," which was gradually changing the face of the neighbourhood; but it too at last yielded to its fate, and in 1846 its site was occupied by one of the stately "Washington Stores." The father of Washington Irving was a native of Scotland, his mother an Englishwoman, and perhaps it is not entirely a matter of imagination to fancy that the national characteristics of both parents are to be discovered in several of the productions of the author of The Sketch-Book and Bracebridge Hall.

The earliest of Mr. Irving's contributions to the Republic of Letters—a number of letters on the drama, the social customs of New York, &c.—were pub., in 1802, (under the nom de plume of Jonathan Oldstyle,) in The Morning Chronicle, a Democratic journal, edited by the author's brother, Dr. Peter Irving. These epistles appeared in pamphlet form, without the author's consent, in the year 1824. After some attention to the study of Coke and Blackstone, the state of Mr. Irving's health caused him in 1804 to seek for that physical benefit which a change of scene and climate might naturally be expected to afford. After an absence of two years in Italy, Switzerland, France, and England, &c., he returned home in 1806, resumed his legal studies, and was admitted to the bar. In January, 1807, appeared, to the great delight of the wits of the good city of Gotham,—always willing to enjoy a laugh,—the first number of a semi-monthly magazine, the joint production of Washington Irving and William Irving; the latter contributing the poetry, and hints and sketches for some of the essays. This was the since-famous Salmagundi, or The Whim-Whams and Opinions of Lemuelot Langstaff and Others. The amusing character of this periodical rendered it exceedingly agreeable to the town, and its popularity promised a long and profitable life; but for some reason or other it was discontinued after the issue of the twentieth number. In 1809 was pub. the famous History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker. The first part of this work was sketched in company with Dr. Peter Irving, who, on his departure for Europe, confided the whole to Washington, by whose humorous genius it was expanded to its present shape. Though this was one of the first-fruits of his inventive talent, it is risking but little to affirm that in its peculiar qualities it has not been surpassed by any later efforts—successful as they have been—of its accomplished author. In 1810, Washington Irving—who had never found sufficient attraction in his legal studies to induce him to practise the profession—was admitted as a partner, with two of his brothers, in the extensive commercial establishment which they conducted at New York and Liverpool. The failure of this house in 1817, consequent upon the pecuniary difficulties which followed the treaty of peace between England and the United States, occurred when Washington was in Europe, and this reverse of fortune induced the already popular author to determine to follow literature as a profession. He had of late employed his pen but seldom: a series of naval biographies contributed to Moses Thomas's (of Philadelphia) Analectic Magazine, (of which Irving was in 1813-14 the editor,) and a biographical sketch of Thomas Campbell, prefixed to a Philadelphia edit. of the works of the latter, are all of Irving's productions with which the world seems to have been favoured, from the date of the publication of The Knickerbocker, in 1809 to the time of the appearance of The Sketch-Book, in 1819. The numbers of the last-named work (composed in London) were transmitted to New York for publication, were read with avidity on both sides of the water, and several of the series were soon copied by Jordan in the London Literary Gazette, and by the editors of other periodicals.

"We are greatly at a loss [remarks the formidable Blackwood in the number for February, 1830] to comprehend for what reason Mr. Irving has thought fit to publish his Sketch-Book in America earlier than in Britain; but at all events he is doing himself great injustice by not having an edition printed here of every number, after it has appeared in New York. Nothing has been written for a long time, for which it would be more safe to promise great and eager acceptance."—Vol. vi. 457, (by J. G. Lockhart.)

This is the article referred to by Sir Walter Scott in the letter quoted by Irving in the Preface to his revised edit. of The Sketch-Book.

This was encouragement indeed,—encouragement such as many a British aspirant for literary fame would have given the copy-right of his best work to have secured. In the same month in which the above eulogy appeared, Irving pub. in London, under the nom de plume of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent^s, the first vol. of The Sketch-Book. It was printed by John Miller, but at the author's expense; Murray, the Great Mogul of the book-trade, having declined the enterprise. The failure of Miller within a few weeks after the publication threw Irving again on the town for a publisher, and, through the friendly offices of Sir Walter Scott, Murray was induced to act in the premises. He gave the author £200, which he soon felt justified by the sale of the work in increasing to £400. The Sketch-Book was originally pub. in February, 1820, in 1 vol., but in July of the same year it appeared in 2 vols.,—a 2d edit. of the 1st, together with a new vol. The author had now attained an extended literary reputation, both at home and abroad; and so far was he from having any difficulty in procuring a publisher, that when Bracebridge Hall, or the Humourists, was ready for the press in 1822, Mr. Murray was ready to offer 1000 guineas for the copy-right without having seen the MS. He obtained the coveted prize at his offer, and subsequently gave the same author nearly twice as much (£2000) for the Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, and quite three times as much (3000 guineas) for the History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus. But we anticipate. The dates of the publications of Irving's succeeding works, given to the world between the appearance of The Sketch-Book in London, in 1820, and his return to the United States in May, 1832, were as follows:

Bracebridge Hall, or the Humourists; a Medley, by Geoffrey Crayon, Gent^s, Lon., 1822, 2 vols. 8vo; N. York, 1822, 2 vols. 8vo.

Tales of a Traveller, by Geoffrey Crayon, Gent^s, Lon., 1824, 2 vols. 8vo; N. York, 1824, 4 Pts. Sold to Murray (without his having seen the MS.) for 1500 guineas.

The Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus, 1828, 4 vols. 8vo; N. York, 1828, 3 vols. 8vo.

Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, Lon., 1829, 2 vols. p. 8vo; Phila., 1829, 2 vols. 12mo.

Voyages of the Companions of Columbus, 1 vol., Lon., Paris, and Phila., 1831.

The Alhambra, Lon., 1832, 2 vols. 8vo; Phila., 1832, 2 vols. 12mo.

In May, 1832, as above stated, Mr. Irving returned home, after an absence of seventeen years. During this long period he had been an extensive traveller. We left him at London, superintending the publication of The Sketch-Book, in 1820. A portion of this year and of the following was spent in the city of Paris: the winter of 1822 was passed at Dresden, and that of 1825 in the South of France. In the winter of 1825-26, at the earnest request of Mr. Alexander H. Everett, American minister to Spain,—to whom the idea was first suggested by O. Rich, Esq., American Consul at Madrid,—Mr. Irving visited Madrid for the purpose of translating into English the valuable compilation of Navarrete, Coleccion de los Viages y Descubrimientos, &c. pub. at Madrid in 1825, (after Mr. Irving's arrival,) in 2 vols. 4to. Mr. Rich, indeed, had from the first set his heart—not upon a mere translation of this collection, but—upon a Life of Columbus from the pen of Washington Irving. This darling desire he was so happy as to see realized, and to him, therefore, is the world indebted for the publication of this work. Mr. Irving was the guest of this eminent bibliographer, whose name has long been honoured by students in both hemispheres; and, says he,

"In his extensive and curious library I found one of the best collections extant of Spanish colonial history, containing many documents for which I might elsewhere search in vain. This he put at my absolute command, with a frankness and unreserve seldom to be met with among the possessors of such rare and valuable works; and his library has been my main resource throughout the whole of my labours."

We shall have more to quote to Mr. Rich's credit when we reach his patronymic in the future pages of our Dictionary. In this year (1826) and the following, as also in the spring of 1829, Mr. Irving made profitable journeys in the South of Spain, the results of which were given to the world in 1829, in The Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada; in 1832, in the picturesque pages of The Alhambra; in 1835, in The Legends of the Conquest of Spain; and in 1849-50, in Mahomet and his Successors.

Mr. Irving left Spain in July, 1829, and returned to London to discharge the duties connected with the Secretaryship of Legation to the American Embassy, which had been conferred upon him during his absence. In 1830 Mr. Henry Hallam and himself were honoured by the gift of the two fifty-guinea gold medals ordered by George IV. to be presented to the two authors who should be adjudged to have attained the greatest excellence in historical composition. This high compliment to Mr. Irving was a well-deserved tribute to the merits of his History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus. In the next year the degree of LL.D. was conferred upon Mr. Irving by the University of Oxford,—a testimonial which that august body is not in the habit of bestowing upon slight foundations. After an absence protracted through seventeen years, Mr. Irving at length sailed for home, and arrived in New York on the 31st day of May, 1832. To one who had conferred such imperishable renown upon the American name—even had there been nothing in the man to elicit that enthusiastic affection with which Washington Irving is regarded by his countrymen—no common honours were accorded. A public dinner was immediately tendered to him in New York, and the friends of early days, together with those who had grown into civic eminence and social consideration during his absence, united in paying homage to him who had conferred honour upon all. The citizens of other States also claimed their right to entertain their illustrious countryman, and nothing but that modesty which has always been a distinguishing trait of his character prevented a series of ovations and a triumphal march through the American Republic from Boston to St. Louis and Philadelphia to New Orleans.

"We cannot refuse ourselves the pleasure," remarks one of the most eminent of his countrymen, "of bearing our humble part in the cordial welcome with which the unanimous voice of the country is now greeting the distinguished pilgrim on his return from abroad. . . . The open and hearty welcome which his fellow-citizens have given him shows that he is best appreciated where he is best known. His reception at New York was the fairest triumph that has yet been accorded to literary desert in the New World."—EDWARD EVERETT: Review of The Alhambra, in N. Amer. Rev., xxxv. 268-282.

Shortly after his return to the United States, Mr. Irving visited some of the most interesting portions of the Great West, and gratified the world with the fruits of his researches among the Indians, in The Tour on the Prairies, pub. in the Crayon Miscellany in 1835. Those more fond of studying the phenomena of life under another phase, found in the Recollections of Abbotford and Newstead Abbey, and The Legends of the Conquest of Spain,—comprising the second and third vols. of the Crayon Miscellany,—sufficient to charm the imagination and delight the taste. To this collection succeeded Astoria; or, Anecdotes of an Enterprise beyond the Rocky Mountains, pub. in 1836, (in which the author was assisted by his nephew, Pierre M. Irving;) and the Adventures of Captain Bonneville, U.S.A., in the Rocky Mountains and the Far West, (based upon the MSS. of Capt. B. and other materials,) which was given to the world in 1837. In the years 1839 and '40, Mr. Irving contributed a number of papers to The Knickerbocker Magazine, a portion of which, with other fugitive articles, were collected in 1845, and pub. in a vol. under the title of Wolfert's Roost. From 1842 to '46 Mr. Irving resided at Madrid as United States Minister to Spain, and, returning home in the latter year, sought a quiet retreat for his remaining years in Wolfert's Roost,—an earthly paradise which we shall not attempt to describe after the portraits which the owner himself has given to the world. The "Stronghold of old Baktus Van Tassel on the Banks of the Hudson," so graphically sketched in the Legend of Sleepy Hollow, has now acquired a double share of renown and undying honors by the occupancy of its eloquent topographer. A well-drawn picture of Wolfert's Roost and its present lord (by Henry T. Tuckerman) will be found in The House of American Authors, N. York, 1853. Here, in his bachelor-home,—for Geoffrey Crayon has been content to eulogize the blessings of matrimony whilst denying himself their indulgence,—in the company of his surviving brother and affectionate niece, who are to him as daughters, the author of the Sketch-Book passes his tranquil days in calm anticipation of that change which, we trust, for the sake of his many friends, is yet at a long distance.

His publications since his retirement have been the Biography and Postical Remains of the late Margaret Miller Davidson, 1841; Oliver Goldsmith, a Biography, 1849, (enlarged from a sketch prefixed to the Works of the latter pub. in Paris, Galland, 1826, 4 vols., Baudry, 1837, 4 vols. 8vo.); Mahomet and his Successors, 2 vols., 1849-50; The Life of George Washington, vol. i., 1855, ii. and iii., 1856. This work will probably comprise two or three more volumes. Mr. Irving has also within the last few years superintended the publication of a revised edit. of his works,—argued thereto by the persuasions of the eminent publisher, Mr. George P. Putnam, of New York. The new edit. was issued by Mr. Putnam in 16 vols., 1848-50, and the sale so far (i.e. to Jan. 1857) has been 350,000 vols., which, added to about as many disposed of the old edit., gives an aggregate sale in America alone of half a million vols. of the works of this popular author. This enumeration does not include the 55,000 vols. already printed of the unfinished Life of Washington, nor the number of copies sold of Wolfert's Roost, which must be very large.

The Works of Washington Irving, in the new revised and uniform edit. just referred to, are thus arranged: Vol. I. Knickerbocker's History of New York. II. The Sketch-Book. III., IV., V. Columbus and his Companions. VI. Bracebridge Hall. VII. Tales of a Traveller. VIII. Astoria. IX. The Crayon Miscellany. X. Capt. Bonneville's Adventures. XI. Oliver Goldsmith; a Biography. XII., XIII. Mahomet and his Successors. XIV. The Conquest of Granada. XV. The Alhambra. To these must be added Wolfert's Roost and The Life of Washington, (also pub. by Geo. P. Putnam & Co. of New York,) which, with The Legends of the Conquest of Spain, will be included in a Second Series of uniform edit. of Irving's Works. A collective London edit. is pub. by Henry G. Bohn, uniform with his Standard Library. It is comprised in 10 thick 8vo vols., (1851),—viz.: Vol. I. Salmagundi and Knickerbocker; with Portrait of Irving. II. Sketch-Book, and Life of Goldsmith. III. Bracebridge Hall, Abbotsford, and Newstead. IV. Tales of a Traveller, and The Alhambra. V. Conquest of Granada, and Conquest of Spain. VI., VII., Life of Columbus, and Companions of Columbus; with a New Index and a fine Portrait. VIII. Astoria, and a Tour on the Prairies. IX. Mahomet and his Successors; with Portrait. X. Conquest of Florida, (by Theodore Irving,) and Adventures of Capt. Bonneville. Irving's Works are also pub. in London, from time to time, by Murray, Bentley, Routledge, W. Smith, Tegg, &c.

Some have been issued with illustrations, on both sides of the Atlantic; and Messrs. Childs & Peterson, of Philadelphia, publish Irving's Select Works, illustrated by F. O. C. Darley and others, in 6 vols. 8vo; viz.: I. The Sketch-Book. II. Knickerbocker's History of New York. III. Tales of a Traveller. IV. Oliver Goldsmith: A Biography. V. The Alhambra. VI. Bracebridge Hall; or, The Hammerstone.

This volume (VI.) is illustrated by fourteen steel plates, engraved by Grathbach and others, from original designs by Schmeltz.

What more acceptable testimonial of regard could be presented to a friend than this valuable set of works?

The same publishers issue a companion-volume to this set, or the complete works of Irving, entitled The Illustrated Beauties of Irving, "containing thirty spirited illustrations of the Works of Washington Irving, finely engraved on steel, accompanied by an elaborate and carefully-prepared Biographical and Critical Sketch of Mr. Irving, from Allibone's Dictionary of Authors; also, a notice of Sunny Side, &c., by H. T. Tuckerman, Esq.; together with choice passages selected from each of Mr. Irving's works."

The "notice" by Mr. Tuckerman, above referred to, is an extract from the admirable sketch entitled Sunny Side and its Proprietor, to which we have just called the attention of the reader who desires to see a graphic portrait of Geoffrey Crayon reposing amidst the rural shades of Sleepy Hollow. We can bear witness to the faithfulness of the picture. There are enough points of resemblance in literary taste, culture, and style between the limner and his subject to make "Tuckerman upon Irving" sound as natural and fitting as "Coke upon Littleton."

Nor must we omit to notice the Illustrated Edition of Irving's Life of Washington, now (1856) in course of publication (by Putnam) in semi-monthly Parts, (14 to each vol.,) imp. 8vo, 100 copies large paper &c.

And now, in accordance with our promise in the preface to this work,—a promise which the preceding pages will prove we have neither forgotten nor delayed to fulfil,—we shall proceed to adduce, as we have done in other instances, the verdicts which eminent critics have passed upon the literary characteristics of the subject of our notice. In many preceding cases we have been obliged to omit much more than we had space to quote of interesting and truly valuable criticism; but, when we commence the pleasing task of citing opinions respecting the productions of Washington Irving, we are literally oppressed by the embarras de richesses. As we glance around our library-shelves, and behold the mass of materials which we have been five years collecting on this theme, (as we have on the same scale, though not to the same extent, collected for the illustration of many thousands of other writers,) we feel it to be no exaggeration to say that we could readily fill a goodly octavo volume with the matter which our space will oblige us to reject. Be it our care, therefore, to make that judicious selection from the materials which invite our research, which shall truly represent the impression which this distinguished writer has made upon the present generation and the one which first sat in judgment on the early fruits of his literary toil.

I. SALMAGUNDI; OR, THE WITH-WHANS AND OPTIMISM OF LAURENCE LANCASTAFF, ESQ., AND OTHERS, January, 1807, to January, 1808:

"We all remember the names of Salmagundi, to which he was a large and distinguished contributor; with what rapidly and to what extent it circulated through America; how familiar it made sparing and broad humour, infinitely outdoing any liberties which Mathews thought fit to take with his hospitable entertainers, and reflecting some credit on the good-temper which was shown by its reception. . . . That Salmagundi owes its principal pretensions to Mr. Irving's exertions are the more inclined to conclude from the evidence of a work in which, not very long afterwards, he tried his strength single-handed, under the title of Knickerbocker's Humorous History of New York."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxi. 474, 475, March, 1826.

"The production of Paulding, Irving, Verplanck, and perhaps of others, in partnership [an error, see p. 936]: the papers of Paulding are more sarcastic, ill-natured, acrimonious,—bitter,—than those of Irving; but quite as able: those by Verplanck we do not know: we have only heard of him as one of the writers: it is a work in two volumes duodecimo: essays, after the manner of Goldsmith,—a downright, secret, laboured, continual imitation of him,—abounding, too, in plagiarisms: the title is from our English FLIM-FLAM: oriental papers, the little man in black, &c. &c. from the Citizen of the World: parts are capital: as a whole, the work is quite superior to any thing of the kind which this age has produced."—JOHN NAL: Blackw. Mag., xvii. 61, Jan. 1826.

2. KNICKERBOCKER'S HISTORY OF NEW YORK, 1809.

It was to this work that Irving owed his fortunate introduction to Sir Walter Scott. Campbell was aware of the delight with which it was read by the Great Unknown, and therefore gave the author a letter to Abbotsford. The young American arrived at Selkirk on the 29th of August, 1817.

"I had come down from Edinburgh," he tells us, "partly to visit Melrose Abbey and its vicinity, but chiefly to get a sight of the 'mighty minstrel of the North.' I had a letter of introduction to him from Thomas Campbell, the poet, and had reason to think, from the interest he had taken in some of my earlier scribbles, that a visit from me would not be deemed an intrusion. On the following morning, after an early breakfast, I set off in a postchaise for the Abbey. On the way thither I stopped at the gate of Abbotsford, and sent the postillion to the house with the letter of introduction and my card, on which I had written that I was on my way to the ruins of Melrose Abbey, and wished to know whether it would be agreeable to Mr. Scott (he had not yet been made a baronet) to receive a visit from me in the course of the morning."—Irving's Abbotsford.

Mr. Lockhart shall tell us in what spirit this "modest approach" was received:

"Scott's family well remember the delight with which he received this announcement: he was at breakfast, and sallied forth instantly, dogs and children after him as usual, to greet the guest and conduct him in person from the highway to the door."—Lockhart's Life of Scott.

Mr. Irving must be permitted to take up the thread:

"Before Scott had reached the gate he called out to me in a hearty tone, welcoming me to Abbotsford, and asking news of Campbell. Arrived at the door of the chaise, he grasped me warmly by the hand: 'Come, drive down, drive down to the house,' said he; 'you're just in time for breakfast, and afterwards you shall see all the wonders of the Abbey.'

"I would have excused myself on the plea of having already made my breakfast. 'Hout, man!' cried he; 'a ride in the morning in the keen air of the Scotch hills is warrant enough for a second breakfast!'"—Idem supra.

Thus graphically is sketched, by the gratified stranger, his first interview with the tried and loving friend of many years; and this lifelike description is familiar, or should be so, to all. But it has been the happy lot of the writer of these pages to hear from Irving's own lips—while the generous tear of affection quivered in his eye—the pathetic account of his last interview with his friend, a few months before the lamentations of nations over his grave testified to the strong hold which he had gained upon the hearts of his readers in every land. But we are anticipating here: should we ever record the deeply-interesting narration to which we refer, it will be more appropriately introduced in our life of the author of Waverley. It is worth mentioning, in this connexion, that in a letter from Scott to John Richardson, dated 22d Sept. 1817, he remarks:

"When you see Tom Campbell, tell him with my best love that I have to thank him for making me known to Mr. Washington Irving, who is one of the best and pleasantest acquaintances I have made this many a day."

Every American who has been abroad, and mingled at all in the polite circles of Europe, can testify that Sir Walter Scott here speaks that only which thousands will gladly endorse. We quote one instance which we find recorded in Mr. N. P. Willis's agreeable Pencilings by the Way. He is describing an evening party at the Countess of Blessington's:

"Nearest me sat Smith, the author of Rejected Addresses,—a hale, handsome man, apparently fifty, with white hair, and a very nobly-formed head and physiognomy. . . . Among other things, he talked a great deal of America, and asked me if I knew our distinguished countryman, Washington Irving. I had never been so fortunate as to meet him. 'You have lost a great deal,' he said, 'for never was so delightful a fellow. I was once taken down with him into the country by a merchant to dinner. Our friend stopped his carriage at the gate of his park, and asked us if we would walk through his grounds to the house. Irving refused, and held me down by the coat, so that we drove on to the house together, leaving our host to follow on foot. 'I make it a principle,' said Irving, 'never to walk with a man through his own grounds. I have no idea of praising a thing whether I like it or not. You and I will do them to-morrow morning by ourselves.'" The rest of the company had turned their attention to Smith as he began his story, and there was a universal inquiry after Mr. Irving. Indeed, the first questions on the lips of every one to whom I am introduced as an American are of him and Cooper."

Tom Moore's warm affection for the author of The Sketch-Book is no secret to those who have read the entertaining Diary of the former, recently published by Lord John Russell. We quote from one of the poet's entries a bon mot of Irving's, which has amused us not a little:

"April 10, 1830.—Forgot to mention in its place Irving's description of the evening at Horace Twiss's, (the evening of the day he wanted me to meet the Duke of Wellington.) But few people had come; and 'there was Twiss,' said Irving, 'with his two great men, the Duke and the Chancellor, just like a spider that has got twabig flies and does not know what to do with them.'"

But, the reader will query, how had Scott become acquainted with the literary merits of the young American?—for such acquaintance he seems to have had. Lockhart shall again be our spokesman:

"Scott had received The History of New York by Knickerbocker, shortly after its appearance in 1813, from an accomplished American traveller, Mr. Brevoort; and the admirable humour of this early work had led him to anticipate the brilliant career which its author has since run. Mr. Thomas Campbell, being no stranger to Scott's high estimate of Irving's genius, gave him a letter of introduction," &c.

It so happens—though it is hardly an accident, either—that we have before us a fac-simile of Scott's letter to Mr. Henry Brevoort, acknowledging the receipt of Knickerbocker's History of New York; and it is strictly to our present purpose—the citation of opinions upon Irving's works—to quote this epistle for the gratification of the reader:

"My Dear Sir:—I beg you to accept my best thanks for the uncommon degree of entertainment which I have received from the most excellently-jocose history of New York. I am sensible that as a stranger to American parties and politics I must lose much of the concealed satire of the piece; but I must own that, looking at the simple and obvious meaning only, I have never read any thing so closely resembling the style of Dean Swift as the annals of Diedrich Knickerbocker. I have been employed these few evenings in reading them aloud to Mrs. S. and two ladies who are our guests, and our sides have been absolutely sore with laughing. I think, too, there are passages which indicate that the author possesses power of a different kind, and [he] has some touches which remind me much of Sterne. I beg you will have the kindness to let me know when Mr. Irvine takes pen in hand again, for assuredly I shall expect a very great treat, which I may chance never to hear of but through your kindness. Believe me, dear sir, "Your obliged and humble servant,

"WALTER SCOTT.

"Abbotsford, 23d April, 1812."

We have already seen that it was to the friendly offices of Scott that Irving was indebted for the happy circumstance which made John Murray his publisher, and the handsome tribute to both these gentlemen which appears in the Preface to the revised edition of The Sketch-Book (New York, 1848) must not be omitted in this place:

"From that time [the publication of The Sketch-Book in 1830] Murray became my publisher, conducting himself in all his dealings with that fair, open, and liberal spirit which had obtained for him the well-merited appellation of the Prince of Booksellers. Thus, under the kind and cordial auspices of Sir Walter Scott, I began my literary career in Europe; and I feel that I am but discharging, in a trifling degree, my debt of gratitude to the memory of that golden-hearted man in acknowledging my obligations to him. But who of his literary contemporaries ever applied to him for aid or counsel that did not experience the most prompt, generous, and effectual assistance?"

We continue the quotation of opinions:

"Equally or more admired [than Salmagundi] was Knickerbocker's History of New York, a work to be compared with any thing of the kind in our language; a book of unwearying pleantry, which, instead of flashing out, as English and American humour is wont, from time to time, with long and dull intervals, is kept up with a true French vivacity from beginning to end; a book which, if it have a fault, has only that of being too pleasant, too sustained a tissue of merriment and ridicule."—EDWARD EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xv. 206, July, 1822.

"It has the same faults and same good qualities in its style, its wit and humour, and its characters are evidently by the same hand, as the leading ones in Salmagundi, though not copied from them. They are perfectly fresh and original, and suited to their situations. Too much of the first part of the first volume is laborious and up-hill; and there are places, here and there, in the last part, to which there is the same objection. Our feelings seldom flag in the second."—EDWARD H. DANA, Sr.: N. Amer. Rev., ix. 344, Sept. 1819.

"This we consider as equal to the best, and in some respects perhaps superior to any other, of our author's productions, (viz.: Oldstyle, Salmagundi, Naval Biographies, The Sketch-Book, Brookbridge Hall, Tales of a Traveller, and Columbus.) It is the one which exhibits most distinctly the stamp of real inventive power, the true test, as we have hinted, of genius. The plan, though simple enough, and when hit upon sufficiently obvious, is entirely original."—ALEX. H. EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xxviii. 117-118, Jan. 1820.

"The most elaborate piece of humor in our literature,—Irving's facetious history of his native town."—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit.

"Of the point of many of the allusions contained in this political satire, partaking somewhat of the style of Swift's Tale of a Tub, and in which more than one President of the United States figures, we very much lament that we are not fully competent to judge. To us it is a tantalizing book, of which all that we understand is so good, and affords us so much pleasure, even through an imperfect acquaintance with it, that we cannot but conclude that a thorough knowledge of the whole point in every part would be a treat indeed."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxi. 475, March, 1828.

Another authority does not consider that Irving was so invariably allegorical as the critic just quoted seems to suppose:

"By nine readers out of ten, perhaps, Knickerbocker is read as a piece of generous drollery,—nothing more. Be it so. It will wear the better. The design of Irving himself is not always clear, nor was he always undervaluing in his course. Truth or fable, fact or falsehood,—it was all the same to him, if a bit of material came in his way. In a word, we look upon this volume of Knickerbocker,—though it is tiresome, though there are some wretched failures in it, a little overdoing of the humorous, and a little confusion of purpose throughout—as a work honourable to English literature, manly, bold, and so altogether original, without being extravagant, as to stand alone among the labours of men."—JOHN NEAL: Blackw. Mag., xvii. 62, Jan. 1825.

"To speak the plain truth, Diedrich Knickerbocker is, after all, our favourite. There is more richness of humour, and there is more strength of language too, in these earlier efforts."—Blackw. Mag., xiv. 584, Nov. 1823.

"The whole book is a jeu-d'esprit, and perhaps its only fault is, that no jeu-d'esprit could be quite so long as to fill two closely-printed volumes."—Ibid., vii. 361, July, 1820, (by J. G. Lockhart.)

The eloquent historian of The Conquest of Mexico, in a dissertation upon the Right of Title by Discovery, after referring the reader to some of the great legal luminaries of different countries,—to Vattel, Kent, and Wheaton,—concludes with the following allusion to the erudite essay of our ancient friend, the chronicler of the early fortunes of Nieuw-Nederlands:

"If it were not treating a grave discussion too lightly, I should have leave to refer the reader to the renowned Diedrich Knickerbocker's History of New York, (book 1, chap. 5,) for a luminous disquisition on this knotty question. At all events, he will find there the popular arguments subjected to the test of ridicule,—a test showing, more than any reasoning can, how much, or rather how little, they are really worth."—Prescott's Hist. of the Conquest of Mexico, 23d ed., Bost., 1855, li. 83, n.

For further notices of Knickerbocker's History of New York, see Lon. Month. Rev., xciv. 67; Lon. Athen., 1832, 458; Knickerbocker Mag., iii. 1; GRANTINE, JAMES, p. 717, in this Dictionary.

3. THE SKETCH-BOOK, 1819-20.

"I have glanced over The Sketch-Book. It is positively beautiful, and increases my desire to crimp you, if it be possible."—Sir Walter Scott to Washington Irving, offering him the editorship (with a salary of £500 per annum) of a projected Edinburgh weekly literary periodical. This offer was gratefully declined by Irving.

"But, though it is primarily for its style and composition that we are induced to notice this book, it would be quite unjust to the author not to add, that he deserves very high commendation for its more substantial qualities; and that we have seldom seen a work that gave us a more pleasing impression of the writer's character, or a more favourable one of his judgment and taste. . . . It seemed fair and courteous not to stir a stranger on his first introduction to our pages; and what we have quoted, we are persuaded, will justify all that we have said in his favour. . . . We have found the book in the hands of most of those to whom we have thought of mentioning it."—LOUIS JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xxxiv. 161, 168, 176, Aug. 1830.

"Few recent publications have been so well received in England as The Sketch-Book. Several of the Waverley novels have passed through fewer editions than this agreeable work, and the journals of most consequence have paid the highest compliments to its merit. We are nevertheless free to confess that we think The Sketch-Book as a whole inferior to the author's earlier writings."—EDWARD EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xv. 208, July, 1822.

"We will be open with him, and tell him that we do not think the change is for the better. He appears to have lost a little of that natural run of style for which his lighter writings were so remarkable. He has given up something of his direct, simple manner, and plain phraseology, for a more studied, periphrastical mode of expression. He seems to have exchanged words and phrases which were strong, distinct, and definite, for a genteel sort of language, cool, less definite, and general. 'Tis as if his mother-English had been sent abroad to be improved, and in attempting to become accomplished, had lost too many of her home qualities. . . . The Sketch-Book is extremely popular, and it is worthy of being so. Yet it is with surprise that we have heard its style indiscriminately praised. . . . Had we thought less highly of his powers, we should have said less about his errors. Did we not take delight in reading him, we should have been less earnest about his mistakes. . . . He is a man of genius, and able to bear his faults."—RICHARD H. DANA, SR.: N. Amer. Rev., ix. 348, 350, 356, Sept. 1819.

"The characteristics of The Sketch-Book are essentially the same with those of the preceding work; but, with somewhat more polish and elegance, it has somewhat less vivacity, freshness, and power. This difference constitutes the distinction between Mr. Irving's first and second manner, the latter of which is preserved in all his subsequent publications, excepting the one immediately before us, [Life of Columbus.] Of these two manners, the one or the other may perhaps be preferred by different readers, according to their different tastes. We incline ourselves to the former, conceiving that spirit and vigour are the highest qualities of style, and that the loss of any merit of this description is but poorly compensated by a little additional finish."—ALAN H. EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xxviii. 119, Jan. 1829.

"His stories of Rip Van Winkle and Sleepy Hollow are perhaps the finest pieces of original fictitious writing that this country has produced, next to the works of Scott."—Chambers's Cyc. Eng. Lit., Edin., 1844, ii. 594.

Dr. Dibdin, a Nestor among critics, cannot find words sufficiently strong in which to express his admiration of The Sketch-Book. Referring to Mr. Roscoe, he remarks: "This is probably the last time that his name will adorn these pages; and in taking leave of it how can I better express my feelings than in the beautiful language of the author of The Sketch-Book?"—Library Companion, ed. 1823, 542.

Again:

"I know of few passages—indeed, I know of none—which so completely and so deliciously (if I may so speak) describe the comforts of a well-stored library as the following, from the author of The Sketch-Book: 'When all that is worldly turns to dust around us, these only retain their steady value,' &c."

The doctor quotes to the end of the next paragraph, and then demands,

"Can sentiment (I ask) be purer, or language more harmonious, than this?"—Ibid. supra, p. 544. See also p. 346.

"The Sketch-Book is a timid, beautiful work; with some childish pathos in it; some rich, pure, bold poetry: a little squeamish, pulling, lady-like sentimentality: some courageous writing, some wit, and a world of humour, so happy, so natural, so altogether unlike that of any other man, dead or alive, that we would rather have been the writer of it, fifty times over, than of every thing else that he has ever written. The touches of poetry are everywhere; but never where we would look for them. Irving has no passion: he fails utterly in true pathos,—cannot speak as if he were carried away by any thing. He is always thoughtful; and save when he tries to be fine or sentimental, always natural. The 'dusty splendour' of Westminster Abbey, the 'ship staggering' over the precipices of the ocean, the shark 'daring, like a specter, through the blue waters,'—all these things are poetry, such poetry as never was, never will be, surpassed. We could mention fifty more passages,—epithets of power, which no mere prose writer would have dared, under any circumstances, to use."—JOHN NEAL: Blackw. Mag., xvii. 65, Jan. 1825.

"We trust some arrangement has been entered into, by virtue of which the succeeding numbers of this exquisite miscellany may be early given to the English public; who, we are sure, are, at least, as much inclined to receive them well as the American. Mr. Washington Irving is one of our first favourites among the English writers of this age, and he is not a bit the less so for having been born in America."—Blackw. Mag., vii. 361, July, 1820, (by J. G. Lockhart.)

We have already quoted Lockhart's opinion of The Sketch-Book on a preceding page, q. v. See also Christopher North's Noctes Ambrosianæ, July, 1822, and May, 1823.

"Of the merit of his Knickerbocker and New York Stories we cannot pretend to judge. But in his Sketch-Book and Bracebridge Hall he gives us very good American copies of our British Essayists and Novelists, which may be very well on the other side of the water, or as proofs of the capabilities of the national genius, but which might be dispensed with here, where we have to boast of the originals. Not only Mr. Irving's language is with great taste and felicity modelled on that of Addison, Goldsmith, Sterne, or MacKenzie, but the thoughts and sentiments are taken at the rebound, and, as they are brought forward at the present period, want both freshness and probability. Mr. Irving's writings are literary anachronisms. He comes to England for the first [the second] time; and, being on the spot, fancies himself in the midst of those characters and manners which he had read of in The Spectator and other approved authors, and which were the only idea he had hitherto formed of the parent-country. Instead of looking round to see what we are, he sets to work to describe us as we were, at second-hand."—Blackw. Mag., vii. 361, July, 1820, (by J. G. Lockhart.)

As this charge—of literary anachronism—has often been urged against some of the graphic scenes depicted in The Sketch-Book and Bracebridge Hall, it is only just to allow the author to be heard in his own defence:

"At the time of the first publication of this paper, [The Christmas Dinner, in The Sketch-Book,] the picture of an old-fashioned Christmas in the country was pronounced by some as out of date. The author had afterwards an opportunity of witnessing almost all the customs above described, existing in unexpected vigour in the skirts of Derbyshire and Yorkshire, where he passed the Christmas holidays. The reader will find some account of them in the author's account of his sojourn in Newstead Abbey."—Note to revised edit. of The Sketch-Book, New York, 1848, p. 298.

We lack space to quote Mr. Irving's description of the primitive customs which he found in full and honoured observance in different parts of England,—customs which, as he remarks,

"Have only been pronounced obsolete by those who draw their experience merely from city life. . . . It has been deemed that some of the anecdotes of holiday customs given in my preceding writings related to usages which have entirely passed away. Critics who reside in cities have little idea of the primitive manners and observances which still prevail in remote and rural neighbourhoods."—Crayon Miscellany: Newstead Abbey, N. York, 1848, 294, 295.

Mr. Irving's comments are fully endorsed by an eminent English authority:

"The accuracy of his pictures of old English customs and sports, which he represents as flourishing under the influence of the benevolent squire, has been questioned, we know, by suburban readers: in our opinion, and according to our experience, there is nothing too highly coloured in them. [The writer then proceeds to prove his position.] We think, therefore, that, far from exceeding the limits of probability in this respect, Mr. Irving has hardly made the full use of northern customs which was really open to him. Nor can we see any thing overdrawn in the characters themselves."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxi. 476, 477, March, 1826.

The Dublin University Mag. remarks, in the same strain: "Bracebridge Hall is the only account we have which gives any thing like a true picture of the life of an English country gentleman of our own day."—May, 1826, 564.

Other reviews of The Sketch-Book appeared in the Lon. Quar. Rev., xxv. 50; Lon. Month. Rev., xciii. 198; Edin. Month. Rev., iv. 303. In our life of Lord Byron, p. 323 of this Dictionary, will be found an interesting account of the enthusiastic admiration expressed by his lordship of The Sketch-Book and its author.

Before we leave our subject, we must not forget to copy an entry in Moore's Diary, in which the success of The Sketch-Book at its first appearance is referred to:

"Dined with McKay at the table-d'hôte, at Maurice's, for the purpose of being made known to Mr. Washington Irving, the author of the work which has lately had success, The Sketch-Book; a good-looking and intelligent-mannered man."—Paris, Dec. 21, 1820.

4. BRACEBRIDGE HALL; OR, THE HUMOURISTS, 1822:

"The great charm and peculiarity of his work consists now, as on former occasions, in the singular sweetness of the composition, and the mildness of the sentiments,—skilled over perhaps a little, now and then, with that cloying heaviness into which unvaried sweetness is so apt to subside. The rhythm and melody of the sentences is certainly excessive: as it not only gives an air of mannerism, but raises too strong an impression of the labour that must have been bestowed, and the importance which must have been attached to that which is, after all, but a secondary attribute to good writing. It is very ill-natured in us, however, to object to what has given us so much pleasure; for we happen to be very intense and sensitive admirers of those soft harmonies of studied speech in which this author is apt to indulge himself; and have caught ourselves, oftener than we shall confess, neglecting his excellent matter, to lap ourselves in the liquid music of his periods, and letting ourselves float passively down the mellow falls and windings of his soft-flowing sentences, with a delight not inferior to that which we derive from fine versification."—LOAN JEFFREY; Edin. Rev., xxxvii. 338-339, Nov. 1822.

"We have no hesitation in pronouncing Bracebridge Hall quite equal to any thing which the present age of English literature has produced in this department. In saying this, we class it in the branch of easy-writing. . . . Besides the episodic tales, he has given us admirable sketches of life and manners, highly curious in themselves, and rendered almost important by the good-natured mock gravity, the ironical reverence, and lively wit, with which they are described. We can scarce express the delight with which we turn to the definite images such a work excites, from the vagueness and generality of ordinary story-writing, where personages without prototypes in any society on earth speak a language learned out of books, without a trait of nature, life, or truth."—EDWARD EVERETT; N. Amer. Rev., xv. 309, 228-224, July, 1822.

"Bracebridge Hall certainly does not possess the spirit of The Sketch-Book."—Blackw. Mag., xi. 668, June, 1822.

"STOUT GENTLEMAN—very good, and a pretty fair account of a real occurrence. [see Note at bottom of the page:] STURGEON OF SALAMANCA—beneath contempt: Irving has no idea of genuine romance, or love, or any thing else, we believe, that ever seriously troubles the blood of men; ROCKEY—struck off in a few hours; contrary to what has been said, Irving does not labour as people suppose—he is too indolent—given too much, we know, to revery: DOLPH HETTLER; THE HAUNTED HOUSE; SPOON SMITH—all in the fashion of his early time: perhaps—we are greatly inclined to believe—perhaps the remains of what was meant for Salmagundi or Knickersbocker: the rest of the two volumes quite unworthy of Irving's reputation."—JOHN NEAL; Blackw. Mag., xvii. 60, January, 1825.

"In spite, however, of the pleasure which Bracebridge Hall has afforded us, we can see nothing in it which might not have been compressed into the space of one volume. The make-weights (for we can give them no other name) which are thrown in to round off the work more properly belong to Mr. Irving's recent publication, the Tales of a Traveller; in fact they are, for the most part, told by the same imaginary narrators, and we shall, therefore, consider them under the same head."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxi. 481-482, March, 1826.

See also Moore's Diary, March 19, 1821.

5. TALES OF A TRAVELLER, 1824.

"I have been miserably disappointed in the Tales of a Traveller." In this strain commences Timothy Tickler's review of the Tales, and he proceeds to abuse them terribly: the more so, he intimates, from the fact that "Few people have admired Mr. Irving more than myself, few have praised him more, and certainly few wish him and his career better than I do at this moment."—Blackw. Mag., xvi. 294, 297, Sept. 1824.

In the same periodical (xvii. 66-67, American Writers, No. 4, by John Neal) the Tales are quite as severely handled, but the critic dismisses the author with many civil words and a hearty benediction:

"You—Geoffrey Crayon—have great power,—original power. We rejoice in your failure now, because we believe that it will drive you into a style of original composition, far more worthy of yourself. Go to work. Lose no time. Your foundations will be the stronger for this uproar. You cannot write a novel, a poem, a true tale, or a tragedy. You can write another Sketch-Book worth all that you have ever written, if you will draw out from yourself. You have some qualities that no other living writer has.—a bold, quiet humour, a rich, beautiful mode of painting without caricature, a delightful, free, happy spirit: make use of them. We look to see you all the better for this trouncing. God bless you! Farewell."

The reviewer in the London Quarterly (vol. xxxi. 481-487, March, 1826) finds hardly any thing to commend in the Tales of a Traveller, save the autobiography of Bracebridge:

"It is with great pleasure that we turn from productions which Mr. Irving honestly confesses to be the sweepings of his Scratch-Book, to the tale of Bracebridge, whose adventures, together with those of his friends, occupy the second division of the Tales. In this instance, finding the contents of the said Scratch-Book run short, he has been driven to tax his own invention in good earnest, and the result is excellent. From the evidence of this tale, which abounds in point and incident, it seems probable to us that he might as a novelist prove no contemptible rival to Goldsmith, whose turn of mind he very much inherits, and of whose style he particularly reminds us in the life of Dribble. Like him, too, Mr. Irving possesses the art of setting ludicrous perplexities in the most irresistible point of view, and we think equals him in the variety, if not in the force, of his humour. . . . After the evidence of Mr. Irving's powers afforded by the last-quoted passage, he must in future be true to his own reputation throughout, and correct the habits of indolence which so considerable a part of the Tales of a Traveller evince. The indulgence which he so fairly deserves at his outset, as an ingenious stranger intuitively proficient in the style and ideas of the mother-country, must now cease, and he must be considered in future as not only admitted to the full freedom and privilege of the English guild of authorship, but amenable also at the same time, as an experienced craftsman, to its most vigorous statutes. We may congratulate him on the rank which he has already gained, of which the momentary caprice of the public cannot long deprive him: and with hearty good will, playfully, but we hope not profanely, we exclaim, as we part with him, 'Very pleasant hast thou been to me, my brother Jonathan.'"—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxi. 483-484, 486-487.

But perhaps the most severe of all the reviews of the Tales of a Traveller appeared in the Westminster Review, (ii. 334,) then in the first blossom of its youth. Geoffrey Crayon's courteous notices of the English nobility, and his equally creditable disgust at the sanguinary horrors of the French Revolution, excited the ire of the democratic critic to an uncontrollable pitch. Even the author's admiring friend, Tom Moore, seems to have had but little hope for the success of the Tales:

"Irving and I set out for the cottage between ten and eleven. Took Irving after dinner to show him to the Starkeys, but he was sleepy, and did not open his mouth: the same at Elwyn's dinner. Not strong as a lion, but delightful as a domestic animal. Walked him over this morning to call on Lord Lansdowne, (come down in consequence of Lord King's illness,) who walked part of the way back with us. Read me some parts of his new work, Tales of a Traveller. Rather tremble for its fate. Murray has given him 1800*l.* for it; might have had, I think, 2000*l.*"—June 17, 1824.

6. THE LIFE AND VOYAGES OF CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS, 1828:

"Venient auras
Secula seris, quibus, Oceanus
Vincula rerum laxet, at ingens
Patet tellus, Typique novae
Detegat Orbem, nec sit tervis
Ultima Thule."—SHAKESPEARE: Medea.

"The author, having resided for some years past in Madrid, and enjoyed access to the archives of the Spanish Government, as well as to many private libraries, has been enabled to weave into this work many curious facts, hitherto unknown, concerning the History of Columbus."

The existence of a new world beyond the Atlantic was firmly believed by many of the ancients, as is abundantly proved by numerous passages in the classics:

"None of the intimations (remarks Mr. Prescott) are so precise as that contained in the well-known lines of Seneca's Medea:

"Venient annis, aevum, &c."

Although, when regarded as a mere poetical vagary, it has not the weight which belongs to more serious suggestions of similar import, in the writings of Aristotle and Strabo. The various allusions in the ancient classic writers to an undiscovered world form the subject of an elaborate essay in the Memorias de Acad. Real de Ciencias de Lisboa, (tom. v. pp. 101-112,) and are embodied, in much greater detail, in the first section of Humboldt's Histoire de la Géographie du Nouveau Continent: a work in which the author, with his usual acuteness, has successfully applied the vast stores of his erudition and experience to the illustration of many interesting points connected with the discovery of the New World and the personal history of Columbus."—Hist. of the Reign of Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed., Bos., 1856, p. 116-117, n.

Mr. Prescott remarks in the text:

"A proof of this popular belief occurs in a curious passage of the Morgante Maggioro of the Florentine poet Pulci, a man of letters, but not distinguished for scientific attainments beyond his day. The passage is remarkable, independently of the cosmographical knowledge it implies, for its allusion to phenomena in physical science not established till more than a century later.

The devil, alluding to the vulgar supposition respecting the Pillars of Hercules, thus addresses his companion Rinaldo:

"Know that this theory is false: his bark
The daring mariner shall urge far o'er
The western wave, a smooth and level plain,
Albeit the earth is fashioned like a wheel.
Man was in ancient days of grosser mould,
And Hercules might blush to learn how far Beyond the limits he had vainly set
The dulcet sea-boat soon shall wing her way.
Men shall decry another hemisphere,
Since to one common centre all things tend;
So earth, by curious mystery divine,
Well balanced, hangs amid the starry spheres.
At our Antipodes are cities, states,
And thronged empires, ne'er divined of yore.
But see, the Sun speeds on his western path
To glad the nations with expected light."

PULCI: Morgante Maggiore, canto 25, st. 220, 220."

"I have used blank verse (proceeds Mr. Prescott, in a note) as affording facility for a more literal version than the corresponding ottava rima of the original. This passage of Pulci, which has not fallen under the notice of Humboldt, or any other writer on the same subject whom I have consulted, affords probably the most circumstantial prediction that is to be found of the existence of a western world. Dante, two centuries before, had intimated more vaguely his belief in an undiscovered quarter of the globe:

'De vostri sensi ch'è del rimanente,
Non vogliate negar l'esperimento,
Diretto al sol, dal mondo senza gente.'
Inferno, cant. 26, v. 115."—Ubi supra, 117-118, 118, n.

We happen to have lying on our table a notice of a work which should not be neglected by the collector of American History, (a large class among our friends in Boston and New York,) and which we observe has not escaped the researches of Mr. Irving (Hist. of Columbus) or of Mr. Prescott, (Hist. of Ferdinand and Isabella.) It is entitled Raccolta del Documento Originale e inediti spettante a Cristoforo Colombo alla Scoperta ed al Governo dell'America, Genoa, 1823, 4to. An invaluable collection of authentic remains, letters, memorials, &c. of the great navigator, with a learned introduction by Prof. Spotorno.

An English trans. of this work was issued in the same year (1 vol. 8vo, pp. 159 and 255) in London. A notice of this collection will be found in Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 152, 155; N. Amer. Rev., xviii. 415-417, April, 1824, (by Jared Sparks); Ibid., xxi. 398-429, Oct. 1825. The Coloecien de los Viajes y Descubrimientos de Don Martin Fernandez de Navarrete, Madrid, 1825, 2 vols. 4to, (3d vol., 1829, 4to,) to which we have already referred, will of course be found in the American department of the collector's Library. Those who are still ignorant of the value of this treasury, and the eminent services of its erudite compiler to the important cause of historical research, must consult Prescott's Mexico, 23d ed., 1855, Pref., vi.-vii.; his Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed., 1856, Pref., v., and vol. ii., 133-134, 507, n.; his Peru, ed. 1855, Pref., vi.-vii., vol. ii., 76; Irving's Columbus and his Companions, ed. 1848, i., Pref., 13-18, iii., Introduc., xv. See also a review of Navarrete's Coloecion,—written by Caleb Cushing, of Massachusetts, a ripe scholar,—in the N. Amer. Rev., xxiv. 265-294, April, 1827.

"His great work, Coloecion de los Viajes y Descubrimientos," remarks Mr. Prescott, "although far from being completed after the original plan of its author, is of inestimable service to the historian."—Peru, Pref., vii.

Perhaps we have already lingered sufficiently long on the threshold of our subject,—the citation of opinions respecting Irving's History of Columbus; but we must not pass on without commending to our reader a notice in the N. Amer. Rev., xliii. 43-52, July, 1836, (by J. L. Kingsley,) of the Italian Jesuit Ubertino Carrara's Latin epic on the Discovery of America, entitled Columbus, first pub. 1715, at Rome. The poet thus announces his subject:

"Primus ab Europâ, Solis qui visceris urnam,
Perque prophanatum velle mare, maxima regna
Regibus Hispanis, orbemque adjeceris orbis,
Sit mihi materies operis."—Lab. l. 1.

We recently cut the following notice from some paper of the day:

"Chart of Columbus.—An old picture-dealer has lately sold to the Spanish Government, for 4000 fr., the chart which the pilot of Columbus, Juan de la Cosa, used in his voyage to the New World. It was formerly in one of the public libraries of Spain; and, when the galleries and churches of that country were ravaged by Marshal Soult, it fell into his hands, with The Conception, by Murillo, and various other spoils."

In the addition of opinions respecting the manner in which Mr. Irving has acquitted himself in the responsible office of the biographer of the Great Admiral, with whom can we so properly begin as with that eminent scholar to whose researches Mr. Irving and the world at large are so much indebted for all that we know of the illustrious Genoese? And here we are greatly pleased in being able to quote in evidence the most unqualified commendation of Mr. Irving's labours, which eulogy we are the more rejoiced to find from the certainty that if the opinion made as much against, as it fortunately does for, the historian's reputation, it would not be withheld from our readers. Our duty is neither to bury Cæsars nor to praise them, but rather to faithfully chronicle the recorded decisions of the great judges of literary jurisprudence. M. Navarrete may well be supposed to have entertained a natural anxiety that the copious collections for the illustration of the Life of Columbus which he had brought together, at the price of so many days and nights of persevering industry and careful research, should be faithfully made known to those who could only enjoy them in an English dress. Indeed, as we have seen in a preceding page, nothing more was originally contemplated by Mr. Everett than a translation by Irving of Navarrete's Coloecion. But, fortunately for the cause of letters, Mr. Irving determined upon a more comprehensive undertaking:

"On considering the matter more maturely, (he remarks,) I perceived that, although there were many books, in various languages, relative to Columbus, they all contained limited and incomplete accounts of his life and voyages; while numerous valuable tracts on the subject existed only in manuscript or in the form of letters, journals, and public muniments. It appeared to me that a history faithfully digested from these various materials was a desideratum in literature, and would be a more satisfactory occupation to myself, and a more acceptable work to my country, than the translation I had contemplated."—Madrid, 1827: Pref. to 1st edit. Life of Columbus.

The work was completed, and this decisive seal to its excellence was impressed by the learned Navarrete himself:

"Yo me complazo en que los documentos y noticias que publico en mi coleccion sobre los primeros acontecimientos de la historia de America hayan recaido en manos tan hábiles para apreciar su autenticidad, para examinarlas con critica, y propagarlas por todos partes, echando los fundamentos de la verdad que hasta ahora há sido tan adulterada por los escritores parciales ó sistematicos."—From a letter dated Madrid, April 1, 1831.

The same distinguished authority, in the Introduction to the 3d vol. of his Collection of Spanish Voyages, after adducing a number of testimonials to the usefulness of the two first vols., (1825, 4to,) remarks:

"Insigne prueba de esto mismo acabo de darnos el Señor Washington Irving en la Historia de la Vida y de los Viajes de Cristóbal Colon que ha publicado con una aceptación tan general como bien merecida. Dignos en nuestra introduccion (1, 366, pag. lxxxii.) que no nos proponiamos escribir la historia de aquel almirante, sino publicar noticias y materiales para que se escribiesen con veracidad, y se una fortuna que el primero que se haya aprovechado de ellas sea un literato juicioso y erudito, conocido ya en su patria y en Europa por otras obras apreciables. Colocado en Madrid, exento de las rivalidades que han dominado entre algunas naciones Europeas sobre Colon y sus descubrimientos; con la proporcion de examinar excelentes libros y preciosos manuscritos, de tratar á personas instruidas en estas materias, y teniendo siempre á la mano los autenticos documentos que acabamos de publicar, ha logrado dar á su historia aquella extension, imparcialidad, y exactitud que la hacen muy superior á las de los escritores que le precedieron. Agrégase á esto, su metódico, arreglo, y conveniente distribucion; su estilo animado, puro, y elegante; la noticia de varias personas que intervinieron de los sucesos de Colon, y el examen de varias cuestiones en que luce siempre la mas sana critica, la erudicion y buen gusto."—Prologo al tomo iii., Madrid, 1829, 4to.

It is proper that we should next quote the verdict of Mr. Alexander H. Everett,—so intimately connected with the inception of this great enterprise,—one of the ripest scholars that America has yet produced, and a critic of too much candour to permit his own interest in the work or his friendship for the author to either influence his judgment or qualify its expression:

"This is one of those works which are at the same time the delight of readers and the despair of critics. It is as nearly perfect as any work well can be; and there is therefore little or nothing left for the reviewer but to write at the bottom of every page, as Voltaire said he should be obliged to do if he published a commentary on Racine, Pulchre! bene! optimè! . . . He has at length filled up the void that before existed, in this respect, in the literature of the world, and produced a work which will fully satisfy the public and supersede the necessity of any future labours in the same field. While we venture to predict that the adventures of Columbus will hereafter be read only in the work of Mr. Irving, we cannot but think it a beautiful coincidence that the task of duly celebrating the achievements of the discoverer of our continent should have been reserved for one of its inhabitants; and that the earliest professed author of first-rate talent who appeared among us should have devoted one of his most important and finished works to this pious purpose."

Such honours illow to her hero paid.
And peaceful slept the mighty Hector's shade."

For the particular kind of historical writing in which Mr. Irving is fitted to labor and excel, the Life of Columbus is undoubtedly one of the very best—perhaps we might say, without the fear of mistake, the very best—subject afforded by the annals of the world. . . . In treating this happy and splendid subject, Mr. Irving has brought out the full force of his genius, as far as a just regard for the principles of historical writing would admit."—N. Amer. Rev., xxviii. 103, 123, 129, Jan. 1829.

The verdict of the brilliant historian of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella—who has so greatly distinguished himself by his researches in the same field of historical investigation as that in which Mr. Irving gleaned so abundant a harvest—must have been awaited by the latter with no little anxiety. In a notice of the publication of the Colección de Señor Navarrete, to which we have frequently referred, Mr. Prescott remarks:

"Fortunately, Mr. Irving's visit to Spain at this period enabled the world to derive the full benefit of Señor Navarrete's researches, by presenting their results in connexion with whatever had been before known of Columbus, in the lucid and attractive form which engages the interest of every reader. It would seem highly proper that the fortunes of the discoverer of America should engage the pen of an inhabitant of her most favoured and enlightened region; and it is unnecessary to add, that the task has been executed in a manner which must secure to the historian a share in the imperishable renown of his subject."—Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed. 1856, II. 123.

"It is not necessary to pursue the track of the illustrious voyager whose career, forming the most brilliant episode to the history of the present reign, has been so recently traced by a hand which few will care to follow."—Ibid., II. 466–468. See also 482–483, n. "The noblest monument to the memory of Columbus."—Ibid., II. 509.

"I will only remark, in conclusion of this too prolix discussion about myself, that, while making my tortoise-like progress, I saw what I had suddenly looked upon as my own ground (having indeed lain unmolested by any other invader for so many ages) suddenly entered, and in part occupied, by one of my countrymen. I allude to Mr. Irving's History of Columbus and Chronicle of Granada; the subjects of which, although covering but a small part of my whole plan, form certainly two of its most brilliant portions. Now, alas! if not devoid of interest, they are at least stripped of the charm of novelty. For what eye has not been attracted to the spot on which the light of that writer's genius has fallen?"—Ibid., I, Pref., xl–xli.

In his Preface to the History of the Conquest of Mexico, Mr. Prescott, referring to the passage just quoted, notices it as a "singular chance," that, after collecting the materials for his last-named work, he found himself "unconsciously taking up ground which Mr. Irving was preparing to occupy." But we have already noticed this fact in our Life of CHARLES JAMES FOX, p. 624 of this Dictionary, to which the reader is referred. We had intended to quote other comments of Mr. Prescott's upon Irving's History of Columbus, but, as our article already lengthens beyond our intended limits, we must be content to refer the reader to the Preface to Mexico, ix., x.; Ibid., iii. 252, n.; Prescott's review of Irving's Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, in N. Amer. Rev., xxix. 293–314, Oct. 1829. See also W. H. Gardiner's review of Prescott's Ferd. and Isabella, in N. Amer. Rev., xli. 203–291, Jan. 1838.—Prescott and Irving Compared, &c.

We proceed with our quotations; but they must be brief: "This is on the whole an excellent book; and we venture to anticipate that it will be an enduring one. Neither do we hazard this prediction lightly, or without a full consciousness of all it implies. . . . For we mean, not merely that the book will be familiarly known and referred to some twenty or thirty years hence, and will pass in solid binding into every considerable collection; but that it will supersede all former works on the same subject, and never be itself superseded."—LOAN JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xlviii. 1–32, Sept. 1828.

"When he writes the history of Columbus, you see him weighing doubtful facts in the scales of a golden criticism. You behold him laden with the manuscript treasures of well-searched archives, and disposing the heterogeneous materials into a well-digested and instructive narration."—EDWARD EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xli. 5, July, 1835.

"This work is written with the attractions of style and taste, and glowing description, which belong to the inspiration of the theme, and to the genius of the distinguished author."—CHARLES KERR.

"A life of Columbus authentic, clear, and animated in narration, graphic in its descriptive episodes, and sustained and finished in style. It is a permanent contribution to English as well as American literature; one which was greatly needed and most appropriately supplied."—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit.

"Since I have been here, I have contrived (by reading a half-hour in the night and a half-hour in the morning) to peruse the whole of Irving's Life of Columbus, in three volumes. It is quite an interesting work, though I think too much spread out by repetition of the same thoughts and descriptions. It is in all respects, however, reputable to the literature of our country."—JESSE BRAY: Letter to Wm. W. Story, Washington, Feb. 21, 1836.

Judge Story's comment reminds us of a similar one recorded by Tom Moore, and Cooper's ready retort:

"When Rogers, in talking of Washington Irving's Columbus, said, in his dry, significant way, 'It's rather long,' Cooper turned round on him, and said, sharply, 'That's a short criticism.'"—Moore's Diary, May 27, 1828.

"Devotion mentioned the enormous price given by Murray for Irving's two last works; 5000 guineas for Columbus, and 2000*l.* for the Chronicle of Granada; the latter never likely, he said, to sell at all."—Ibid., July 16, 1829.

"It is true that for Murray (according to his own account) they have not been so fortunate; his loss on the two publications being (as he says) near 3000*l.*, which may not be far from the truth, as the Chronicles have not sold at all."—Ibid., Nov. 12, 1829.

"By the accession of his volumes, we have now the biography of Columbus; as by Robertson's [History of America] we had before had, and still have, the history. Mr. Irving's has been to me a very interesting production, sometimes marked with passages of great force and beauty; and it contains every thing respecting Columbus that can be wanted. He has had valuable sources of information, which he describes, and which were not within the reach of Robertson. Still, his volumes only show, as usual, the merits of Robertson. Upon looking over the historian's account once more, I see no mistakes, and no material omissions: in a concise and calm manner every particular of importance is intimated to the reader; and Mr. Irving has only told in the detail (but in a very interesting and agreeable manner, and I recommend his volumes to you) what our excellent historian had told before."—Pref. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.

There is another comparison between Robertson and Irving which it occurs to us to quote. It is one drawn by Lord Brougham in his Life of Dr. Robertson, and elicited by the account of the latter, in his History of America, of the first discovery of land by Columbus:

"If the word dramatic," remarks his lordship, "has been applied to this narrative, it has been advisedly chosen; because no one can doubt that with the most scrupulous regard to the truth, and even to the minute accuracy of his history, this composition has all the beauties of a striking poem. To judge of its merits in this respect, I will not compare or rather contrast it with the Histories of Oriedo or Herrera, or Ferdinand Columbus, or even with the far better composition of Dr. Campbell, or whoever wrote the history of the discovery in Harris's Bibliotheca Itinerarium, nor yet with the ambitious but worse-written narrative of Mr. Washington Irving in his Life and Voyages of Columbus," &c.

The noble critic then proceeds (in a note) to quote examples from both writers:

"It is no part of my intention to underrate the merits of this very popular author: but I speak of the manner in which he has treated the subject; and, coming after so great a master, it was not judicious in him to try for effect, instead of studying the chaste simplicity of his predecessor. These are a few of his expressions: The ships 'were plunging the waves;' Columbus was 'wrapped in the shades of night;' he 'maintained an intense watch;' he 'ranged his eye along the dusky horizon;' he beheld 'suddenly a glimmering light.' Robertson had never thought of saying 'suddenly,' as knowing that light must of necessity be sudden. Then the light has 'passing gleams;' his feelings 'must have been tumultuous and intense;' contrary to the fact, and to the character of the man; 'the great mystery of the ocean was revealed;' 'what a bewildering crowd of conjectures thronged on his mind!' All this speculation of the writer to insure the effect, Dr. Robertson rejects as fatal to effect, and gives only what actually happened. Finally, he was possibly to find 'the morning dawn upon spire groves, and glittering fane, and gilded cities.' Surely no one can hesitate which of the two pictures to prefer. If the one is not absolutely tawdry, the other is assuredly more chaste. To compare the two pieces of workmanship is a good lesson, and may tend to cure a vitiated taste, (Book III. Chap. 3.) To take only one instance: 'About two hours before midnight, Columbus, standing on the forecastle, observed a light at a distance, and privately pointed it out to Pedro,' &c. Thus Robertson, Irving says, 'Wrapped from observation in the shades of night, he maintained an intense and unrelenting watch, ranging his eye along the dusky horizon. Suddenly, about ten o'clock, he thought he beheld a light glimmering at a distance.' Can any one doubt which of the two passages is the most striking, — the chaste and severe, or the ornamented and gaudy and meretricious? The account of Robertson makes the ships lie-to all night. Irving either makes them lie-to, and afterwards go on sailing rapidly; or the lying-to was the night before, and they sailed quicker the nearer they came to land and in the dusk. The one makes them only see the shore after dawn; the other makes them see it two leagues off, in a dark night, at two in the morning, within the tropics."—Less of Men of Letters of the Time of George III., Lon. and Glasg., 1855, 265, 266–268, n. 7. CHRONICLE OF THE CONQUEST OF GRANADA, FROM THE MSS. OF FRAY ANTONIO AGAPIDA, 1829.

Perhaps we need hardly inform our readers that the worthy chronicler Fray is an imaginary personage.

"Mr. Irving's late publication, the Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, has superseded all further necessity for poetry, and, unfortunately for me, for history. He has fully availed himself of all the picturesque and animating movements of this romantic era; and the reader who will take the trouble to compare his Chronicle with the present more prosaic and literal narrative [War of Granada, in Ferd. and Isabella] will see how little he has been seduced from historic accuracy by the poetical appeal of his subject. The fictitious and romantic dress of his work has enabled him to make it the medium for reflecting more vividly the floating opinions and chimerical fancies of the age, while he has illuminated the picture with the dramatic brilliancy of colouring denied to sober history."—Prescott's Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed., 1856, II. 109, n.

And see Mr. Prescott's review of the Chronicle, in N. Amer. Rev., xxix. 293–314; also in his Miscellanies, 1855, 88–122.

"A few works recently published in the United States have shed far more light [than Robertson's Charles V. and Watson's Philip II.] on the interior organization and intellectual culture of the Spanish nation. Such, for example, are the writings of Irving, whose gorgeous colouring reflects so clearly the chivalrous spirit dours of the fifteenth century."—Ibid., Miscell., 125-126, q. v.; (from N. Amer. Rev., July, 1837.)

Since Mr. Prescott's commendation was penned, the Chronicle has been brought more strictly within historical bounds, and in other respects also greatly improved.

"His Chronicle, at times, wears almost the air of romance; yet the story is authenticated by frequent reference to existing documents, proving that he has substantial foundation for his most extraordinary incidents."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xlii. 55-80.

This article, explanatory of the work, and carefully avoiding commendation, was written for the Quarterly by Mr. Irving, at the request of Mr. John Murray. See also Lon. Month. Rev., cxix. 430; Amer. Month. Rev., v. 190; Lon. Lit. Gaz., 1829, 329.

9. THE ALHAMBRA, 1832.

"On the whole, we consider the work before us as equal in literary value to any of the others of the same class, with the exception of The Sketch-Book; and we should not be surprised if it were read as extensively as even that very popular production. We hope to have it in our power, at no remote period, to announce a continuation of the series, which we are satisfied will bear, in the booksellers' phrase, several more volumes."—EDWARD EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev. xxxv. 265-282, Oct. 1832.

A very suggestive remark occurs in the course of this review, which we quote with the hope that it will bring forth fruit in its season:

"The period of the Moorish ascendancy is, perhaps, the most interesting in the annals of Spain, and would furnish a fit subject for a more methodical, extensive, and elaborate historical description than has yet been given of it in any language."

Since the above was written, Mr. Prescott, indeed, has given us his truly great work on the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, in which we have a graphic account of the decadence—or, more properly speaking, the extirpation—of the Moorish power in Spain; and he has not neglected eloquently to dilate upon the ancient glories of Cordova, Seville, and Granada in their best estate; but it did not enter into his plan to discuss this comprehensive theme in the extent which can alone do it justice. With the vast collections which he has already made, the profound knowledge of the subject which the digestion of those materials has conferred, and the eloquence and force of his historic pen, what better subject can Mr. Prescott have than the one we have ventured to suggest? But, before we entirely forget Mr. Irving in this episode, we must remember to notice that, whilst Mr. Everett ranks The Alhambra below The Sketch-Book, Mr. Prescott very happily refers to the volume as the "beautiful Spanish Sketch-book, The Alhambra." See Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed., 1856, ii. 100, n. See other reviews of The Alhambra, in the Westminster Rev., xvii. 132; Lon. Athen., 1832, 283; Amer. Month. Rev., ii. 117. We must commend to the attention of those fond of the remains of Moorish antiquity, the splendid publication of Owen Jones, 1842-45, 2 vols. fol. columbia, £24, or in grand eagle fol., £36, entitled Illustrations of the Palace of the Alhambra.

Doubtless the reader of Mr. Irving's thrilling account of his midnight explorations of the Alhambra has often asked himself, "How much of this is sober matter of fact, and how much poetical license?" We are fortunately enabled to answer this question from a letter of Mr. Irving to the author of this Dictionary:

"The account of my midnight rambles about the old palace is literally true, yet gives but a feeble idea of my feelings and impressions and of the singular haunts I was exploring. Every thing in the work relating to myself and to the actual inhabitants of the Alhambra is unexaggerated fact: it was only in the legends that I indulged in romancing; and these were founded on materials picked up about the place.

"To S. AUSTIN ALLISON.

Sunnyside, Nov. 2, 1857."

10. A TOUR ON THE PRAIRIES, 1835.

"To what class of compositions the present work belongs we are hardly able to say. It can scarcely be called a book of travels, for there is too much painting of manners and scenery, and too little statistics; it is not a novel, for there is no story; and it is not a romance, for it is all true. It is a sort of sentimental journey, a romantic excursion, in which nearly all the elements of several different kinds of writing are beautifully and gaily blended into a production almost not generis. . . . We are not sure that the passage in the book which we have read with greatest satisfaction is not that in which we are promised its continuation."—EDWARD EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xli. 1-28, July, 1835.

"The whole work bears the impress of Mr. Irving's taste. A great variety of somewhat discordant materials is brought into a consistent whole, of which the parts have a due reference to each other; and some sketches of life and traits of humour come fresh from the pen of Geoffrey Crayon."—EDWARD EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xlii. 200-237, Jan. 1837.

"I have read Astoria with great pleasure: it is a book to put in your library, as an entertaining, well-written—very well-written—account of savage life, on a most extensive scale. Ellice, who has just come from America, says Mr. Astor is worth £5,000,000 sterling; but Baring does not believe it, or is jealous perhaps."—Rev. Sydney Smith to Sir George Philips, Combe Foley, Dec. 22, 1836: Smith's Letters and Correspondence, 1855, vol. ii.

"The narrative, though told with the grace of the writer, is necessarily dry."—Blackw. Mag., xli. 189, Feb. 1837, q. v.

We must not omit to quote the following well-merited tribute to a gentleman who, by his extensive circulation of sound literature for many years both in Europe and America, has honestly earned the title of a benefactor to the public mind. We refer to Mr. Irving's friend and publisher, Mr. George P. Putnam, of New York:

"We notice Astoria and the Tour on the Prairies now, only on account of their connection with our subject, and to commend the taste and enterprise of the publisher who has given to the reading world what has long been wanted,—a neat and uniform edition of all the writings of Mr. Irving, at a price which ought to obtain for them a wide circulation. These two works, which have all the pleasing characteristics of the author's style, appear very seasonably in a new edition."—PROF. FRANCIS BOWEN: Adventures on the Prairies, in N. Amer. Rev., lxi. 175-196, July, 1849.

We have not the slightest interest in the gains or losses of Mr. Putnam's copy-rights, but we have much in the moral and intellectual cultivation of the mind and heart of our countrymen and countrywomen, and therefore, as Lord Chesterfield said of the witty scintillations of the Dean of St. Patrick's, "He that hath any books in the three kingdoms hath those of Swift," so say we, He that hath any books in this great republic should have those of Irving. As for those who have no books,—if any such there be,—in that household you may look for enfer, mental and physical languor, gossiping, dissipation, and "every evil work." As Sancho Panza conferred his hearty benediction upon the philanthropic inventor of sleep, so do we cordially reverse the character of the literary Howard who founded the first family library. Of Sancho's favourite recreation he could only say, in the height of his somniferous pean, that it "covered a man like a mantle;" but of good books we can testify that they nurture the soul with the food of angels.

But "to proceed with our subject," as the divines say, which has "naturally divided itself" into a hydra-headed discourse: other reviews of Astoria will be found in the Westminster Rev., xvi. 318; Amer. Quar. Rev., xxi. 60; South. Lit. Mess., iii. 59. See also Franchère's Narrative of a Voyage to the Northwest Coast of America, in 1811-14, trans. into English by J. V. Huntington, N. 15. WOLFERT'S ROOST, 1855, 12mo.

This vol. forms No. 4 of Constable's Miscellany of Foreign Literature, pub. at Edinburgh. The publication of this vol. elicited so many complimentary notices, that the New York publishers, Messrs. Geo. P. Putnam & Co., issued a collection of them in pamphlet form of 24 pages. This little brochure should accompany every set of Irving's works. We give an extract from a notice which has escaped the vigilance of the publisher:

"We envy those who will now read these tales and sketches of character for the first time. Washington Irving is here, as he always is, equal to himself. He has the finish of our best writers; he has the equality and gentle humour of Addison and Goldsmith."—Westminster Rev., April, 1855.

Another complimentary notice, also not in the pamphlet just referred to, appeared in the Lon. New Monthly Magazine, and was copied into the Boston Living Age for Aug. 11, 1855. From a review of Wolfert's Roost, in the Lon. Athenaeum, 1855, 192-193, we have already given an extract in our article on Ralph Waldo Emerson, to which the reader is referred.

18. The Life of GEORGE WASHINGTON, N. York, vol. I., 1855; vol. II., III., 1856; IV., 1857. See infra.

We have before us a number of eulogistic reviews of the early vols. of this as yet unfinished history; but it is obvious that a production of this character must be regarded as a whole, and that no intelligent, impartial criticism can be expected until those among us learned in historic lore shall have had opportunity to sit in judgment upon a completed work, and compare accredited "State-Paper" documents with the biographer's charming story. That such verdict will be a favorable one, Mr. Irving's well-known conscientiousness as a historian forbids us to doubt. In the mean time, there can be no impropriety in our remarking that the biographer has well merited the gratitude of his countrymen for transporting the illustrious commander from the learned seclusion of the Senate-Chamber, and the chilling dignity of Congressional Libraries, to the domestic familiarity of the parlour and the winter-evening fireside of the cottage. Reviews of the early vols. of the Life of Washington will be found,—of vol. I., in Westminster Rev., Oct. 1855; vol. II., Ibid., Oct. 1856; vol. I., II., III., Lon. Athenaeum, Aug. 16, 1856; I., II., III., N. Amer. Rev., July, 1856.

As every thing concerning Washington Irving may be presumed to be interesting to the reader, we quote the following genealogical scrap from Dennistoun's Memoirs of Sir Robert Stewart:

"John of Irvyn had landed possessions in the parish of Holm, in Orkney, in 1588, when the county was still an appendage of the crown of Scotland. . . . of Irvyn are very frequently a Branch of Orkney, and their rapid lineaments better attests of Galloway, Galloway are the of most noble of the prior of St. Andrew's Irving. In the author's same blood step by step and victories."

Age*, xiv. 723, (from Lon. Spectator). We have already referred to Lord Byron's enthusiastic attachment to the writings and character of Irving, (Life of Lord Byron in this Dictionary.) In a letter to Tom Moore, (Ravenshoe, July 4, 1831,) he remarks:

"I have had a friend of your Mr. Irving's, . . . and talked with him much of Irving, whose writings are my delight."

Again, under date of Sept. 24, 1821, he proposes to Murray, as one of the articles of their future correspondence, that he should not send him "any modern, or (as they are called) new, publications, in English, whatsoever, save and excepting any of Walter Scott, Crabbe, . . . Irving, (the American,)" &c.

"The names of Cooper, Channing, and Washington Irving," remarks the historian of Modern Europe, "amply demonstrate that the American soil is not wanting in genius of the most elevated and fascinating character."—See ANTHONY AUGER. Hist. of Europe, 1788-1815, chap. 123v.

Mr. Stewart, of the American Navy, a friend of the present Emperor of France, tells us that, when in New York, Louis Napoleon declined to "appear in society," but adds: "There are, however, remarked the prince, 'individuals resistant to New York whose acquaintance I should be happy to make. Mr. Washington Irving is one. I have read his works, and admire him both as a writer and a man, and would take great pleasure in meeting him. Chancellor Kent is another. I have studied his Commentaries, think highly of them, and regard him as the first of your jurists. I would be happy to know him personally.'"

"He did make the acquaintance both of Mr. Irving and the Chancellor," continues Mr. Stewart, "and enjoyed the hospitality of the one at Sunnyside, and of the other at his residence in town."—Letter of Geo. C. Stewart, N. York, April 4, 1856, to the National Intelligencer.

How many can echo this remark of Napoleon I.—"I admire him both as a writer and as a man." It is indeed true, to borrow the words of an eminent American poet,

"Ambition is so strongly marked to all Mr. Irving's writings as never to let you forget the man; and the pleasure is doubled in the same manner as it is in lively conversation with one for whom you have a deep attachment and esteem. There is to it all the gaiety and aliveness of a light, pure spirit,—a careful playing with common things, and here and there beautiful touches, till the ludicrous becomes half picturesque."—EDWARD H. DANA, Esq. N. Amer. Rev., IX. 394, Sept. 1859.

If Mr. Dana were called upon to reaffirm the above, after forty years, and over the large pile of volumes which Mr. Irving has since given to the world, we are satisfied that he would do it without a moment's hesitation.

Many years ago Edward Everett advised the young aspirant after literary distinction,

"If he wishes to study a style which possesses the characteristic beauties of Addison's, its man, simplicity, and elegance, with greater accuracy, point, and spirit, let him give his days and nights to the volumes of Irving."—N. Amer. Rev., xli. 4, July, 1856.

Young men have followed this advice most sedulously; and, indeed, a number of years before this counsel was penned, Mr. Irving's example had produced wonders:

"The great effort which it has produced is sufficiently evident already, in the number of good writers, in various forms of elegant literature, who have sprung up among us within the few years which have elapsed since the appearance of Mr. Irving, and who justify our preceding remark, that he may fairly be considered as the founder of a school."—ALEXANDER H. EVERTS: N. Amer. Rev., XLVIII. 111, Jan. 1858.

"Nevertheless the essays of Washington Irving have offered a solitary specimen of the lighter literature of America, but we can now only regard Geoffrey Crayen as the founder of a class of writers, who follow closely in his footsteps."—Quart. Journal: History of Stories of American Life, edited by Mary Russell Milford.

These remarks apply to both sides of the water. If an English reviewer desire to pay an especially handsome compliment to an author,—presuming that the case admits of a likeness being instituted at all,—he is very likely to be strongly reminded of the style of the author of The Sketch-Book. Let us cite some instances. The author of the article on George Colman and Bonnal Thornton's Connaisseur, in Chambers's Cyclopedia of English Literature, quotes a passage from an essay on Country Churches, "which," says the critic, "seems like a leaf from the notebook of Washington Irving." The reviewer in the London New Times remarks, of the author of Tales of a Voyager, that his "humour is of the spirit and quality of Washington Irving." The London Gentleman's Magazine says that in the perusal of The Journal of an Exile "we have frequently been reminded of the style and manner of The Sketch-Book,"—the same pathos, the same originality of thought, the same felicity of expression." The London Monthly Review is so delighted with The Labours of Major Humphrey Ravolin, that it declares that "many of the practical writers must fall into the rear, in competition with Major Ravolin, who must stand master with Geoffrey Crayen." The London Spectator, in a notice of the Autobiography of Hugh Miller, remarks that "his style has a purity and elegance which reminds one of Irving and Goldsmith." One of the most distinguished of American authors is not disposed to think that any of Irving's imitators have equalled their master; at least, this was his opinion at the time he penned the article from which we are about to quote:

"The endeavour with which the English have recognized Mr. Irving's literary merits is equally honorable to both parties, while his genius has experienced a still more successful homage, in the occasional imitations to which he has given rise, imitations whose uniform failure, notwithstanding all the appliances of so accomplished and talented, prove their model to be insurmountable."—WILLIAM H. FARMER. N. Amer. Rev., XLIV. 191-192, July, 1857.

It is only proper to remark that Mr. Prescott has no reference, so far as we are aware, to either of the comparisons cited above. They were collected by ourselves, in the course of desultory reading. Washington Irving, indeed, can never be confounded with the host of his imitators,

As respects Mr. Irving's fame abroad, it is certainly true, as Mr. Prescott remarks, that his merits have been— from the first, we will add—warmly acknowledged by British critics and cordially appreciated by British readers.

The circulation of his delightful volumes is by no means confined to the literary circles of the critics :

"To my poor cottage, rich only in printed paper," remarks an accomplished lady, "people all come to borrow books for themselves or for their children. Sometimes they make their own selections; sometimes, much against my will, they leave the choice to me; and in either case I know no books that are oftener lent than those that bear the pseudonym of Geoffrey Crayon. Few, very few, can show a long succession of volumes so pure, so graceful, and so varied as Mr. Irving."—Mary Russell Milford's Recollections of a Literary Life.

Such a tribute as this must be peculiarly grateful to Mr. Irving. "It is excellent," says Isabella to the haughty duke, "to have a giant's strength;" but there is a rarer and more precious gift. To have the power, by the magic of the inspiration of genius, to elevate the mind and to improve the heart,—to cause the rich to forget their covetousness and the poor their poverty,—to while away the tedious hours of declining age, of bodily pain, or mental disquietude,—this is indeed a gift more excellent than the giant's strength, the victor's laurel, or the conqueror's crown; and this honour has WASHINGTON IRVING, the author of THE SKETCH-BOOK and THE ALHAMBRA, the biographer of COLUMBUS and of WASHINGTON.

Irving, William, 1766-1821, a native of the city of New York, a brother of Washington Irving, was engaged in mercantile business in the place of his birth for a number of years, and from 1813 to '19 was a member of the National Congress. In 1793 he was married to a sister of James K. Paulding, who was erroneously suspected of having a hand in the composition of Salmagundi,—noticed at length in the preceding article. To this popular periodical William contributed the poetry, and hints and sketches for some of the essays. Of the other three brothers of Washington Irving, Ebenezer, born in 1776, is still living, (in 1857,) and resides with Washington Irving at Sunnyside; Peter, born in 1771, died in 1838; and John Treat, born in 1778, died in 1838. The last two have been noticed on an earlier page of our Dictionary.

The work has been well received on both sides of the Atlantic. The London Critic of April 1st, 1856, compares this work most favourably with publications lately issued by two medical professors at Edinburgh, and dismisses the subject with the remark:

"The conclusion we have come to after a perusal of it is, that Dr. Jackson has been, through a long professional career, a judicious, safe, prudent, and sufficiently energetic practitioner, reflecting credit on American Practice of Physic."

Dr. Jackson was a pupil of Dr. Edward Augustus Holyoke, the centenarian, and gives us a sketch of his character in the introductory letter to the above-named work, which, we may say in conclusion, is of interest to the laic as well as the physician.

Jakob, Therese A. L. Von. See Robinson, Mrs. Edward.

James I., King of Scotland, 1395-1437, the second son of King Robert III., was captured by an English cruiser when on his way to France in 1405, and kept a prisoner in England until 1423, when he ascended the Scottish throne. He was assassinated by some rebellious subjects at Perth in 1437. He employed his imprisonment to such good purpose as to become famous for his erudition and manifold accomplishments. As an author he is best known by The King's Quhair, (Book,) consisting of 197 seven-lined stanzas, and elicited by the charms of the Lady Jane Beaufort, of the blood-royal of England, whom he beheld in the garden from his window in Windsor Castle. Need we add that the restoration to freedom left the royal wooer still a captive, and that the Lady Jane became Queen of Scotland? The other poems ascribed to him are Christis Kirk of the Grene; (also attributed to James V.) Peblis to the Play, (doubtful;) Falkland on the Grene, a Song on Absence, and some minor pieces. The Poetical Remains of James I., edited by Wm. Tytler, were pub., Edin., 1783, 8vo. The Works of James I., containing the three poems noticed above, with two others generally ascribed to King James V.,—The Gabelunzie Man, and the Jollie Beggar,—were pub. at Perth, 1786, 12mo. Tytler's edit. is accused, by Ritson and others, of many errors. The poems of James will also be found in Sibbald's Chronicles of Scottish Poetry. It is alleged that portions of The King's Quhair are superior to any poetry produced in England, with the exception of Chaucer's, before the age of Elizabeth. Indeed, Ellis says,

"It is full of simplicity and feeling, and is not inferior in poetical merit to any similar production of Chaucer."—Spec. of the Early Eng. Poets, ed. 1845, i. 244.

Hallam remarks that

"The King's Quhair is a long allegory, polished and imaginative, but with some of the tediousness usual in such productions."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, i. 126.

But perhaps no one has better described the author and his poem than Washington Irving, in the article entitled A Royal Poet, in the Sketch-Book. This admirable sketch—which was declared by Lockhart (Blackwood's Mag., vi. 559, Feb. 1820) to be "infinitely more graceful than any piece of American writing that ever came from any other hand, and well entitled to be classed with the best English writings of our day"—is, or ought to be, familiar to all of our readers.

"I have been particularly interested," remarks Irving, after a visit to the prince's former prison in Windsor Castle, "by those parts of the poem which breathe his immediate thoughts concerning his situation, or which are connected with the apartment in the Tower. They have thus a personal and local charm, and are given with such circumstantial truth as to make the reader present with the captive in his prison, and the companion of his meditations. . . . As an amatory poem it is edifying, in these days of coarser thinking, to notice the nature, refinement, and exquisite delicacy which pervade it, banishing every gross thought or immodest expression, and presenting female loveliness clothed in all its chivalrous attributes of almost supernatural purity and grace."—Sketch-Book, ed. N. York, 1865, 109-110, 117.

It is declared that James was as ready with his sword as with his pen, and equally so, we may add, with his feet, voice, and fingers, for he could sing, dance, and play on eight different instruments of music. The Scotch historians can never say enough in his praise:

"Ita orator erat, ut ejus dictione nihil fuerit artificiosius; ita Poeta, ut carmina non tam arte strinxisset, quam natura sponte fudisse videretur. Cui rem fidem faciunt carmina diversi generis, quæ in rhythmum Scotice illigavit, eo artificio," &c.—Boswor LEX.: De Rebus Gest. Scot., ed. 1675, 4to, lib. vii. 257, 266, 267.

James II., King of Scotland, son of the preceding, was killed at the siege of Roxburgh, 1460, in the 29th year of his age. Epistola ad Carolum VII. See D'Achery's Spicil., iii. 801.

James IV., King of Scotland, grandson of the preceding, was killed at the battle of Flodden Field, 1513, aged 40. He is said by Bishop Tanner (Bibliotheca) to have written upon the Apocalypse; but this is doubtful. See Park's Walpole's R. and N. Authors.

James V., King of Scotland, son of the preceding, d. 1542, in the 33d year of his age. To him are ascribed Christis Kirk of the Grene, and the Gabelunzie Man, (see James I., ante.) These two were pub. by John Callander, Edin., 1782, 8vo. See Park's R. and N. Authors; Pinkerton's Select Scottish Ballads; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man. Christis Kirk of the Grene is a great favourite with the Scotch:

"One likes no language but the Faery Queen:
Or Scot will fight for Christ's Kirk of the Green."

James VI. of Scotland and I. of England, 1566-1625, grandson of the preceding, and only child of Mary, Queen of Scots, by her cousin, Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, when only 13 years of age pub. a vol. entitled Essayes of a Prentice in the Divine Art of Poesie, with the Rewles and Cauteles to be pursued and avoided, Edin., 1594, 4to. In this vol. we have a mixture of poetry and prose, neither of much value. The latter gives the reader instructions in the proper mode of making verse. This was reprinted in Edin., 1814, sm. 4to, with a Prefatory Memoir by R. P. Gillies. A copy of the original ed. was sold at Bindley's sale for £26 5s. In 1591 appeared His Majesties Poeticall Exercises at Vacant Houres, 4to, and other works followed this collection. In 1616 (fol.) was given to the world a collective ed. of his prose compositions:

James I. his works, pub. by the Bp. of Winchester. Fine portrait by Passe, and frontispiece by Elstrack, folio. Containing Paraphrase on Revelation, Meditations, Basilicon Doron, Dæmonology, Counterblast to Tobacco, Law of Free Monarchies, Powder Treason, Defence of the Rights of Kings, Præmonition to Christian Monarchs, Speeches, &c.

Weldon's Court and Character of James I., Aulicus Coquinarius, Sir E. Peyton's Divine Catastrophe of the House of Stuart.

As an author his majesty certainly has not enjoyed the same reputation since his death that he did in the midst of his brilliant court. Horace Walpole—not generally unwilling to find merit in noble pens—dismisses his majesty's literary claims with more wit than flattery:

"One remark I cannot avoid making: the king's speech is always supposed by parliament to be the speech of the minister: how cruel would it have been on King James's ministers, if that interpretation had prevailed in his reign! . . . Bishop Montague translated all his majesty's works into Latin: a man of so much patience was well worthy of favour."—R. and N. Authors, Park's ed., i. 115-116, 120.

As regards his theological abilities, an eminent authority remarks:

"His character as a man unfortunately adds no weight to his sentiments as an expositor; and his works would long ago have been forgotten, had they not been the production of a royal author. I ought not to omit his Majesty's poetical translation of the Psalms of David; a poor production from a scholar of Buchanan."—Orme's Bibl. Bibl.

James, George Payne Rainsford, b. in London about 1800, commenced his literary career at an early age by anonymous contributions to the journals and reviews which catered to the literary taste of "a discerning public." Some of these juvenile effusions fell under the notice of Washington Irving, and this gentleman, with his usual kindness of heart, encouraged the young author to venture upon something of a more important character than the fugitive essays which had hitherto employed his pen. Thus strengthened in his literary proclivity, the young aspirant nibbed his "gray-goose quill," commenced author in earnest, and gave to the world in 1822 his first work,—a Life of Edward the Black Prince. Mr. James now turned his attention to a field which had recently been cultivated with eminent success,—historical romance,—and completed in 1825 his novel of Richelieu, which, having received the favourable verdict of Sir Walter Scott, made its appearance in 1829. This was followed in the next year by Darnley and De L'Orme.

Richelieu was so fortunate as to secure the favour of the formidable Christopher North of Blackwood; but this invaluable commendation was withheld from Darnley:

"Mr. Colburn has lately given us two books of a very different character, Richelieu and Darnley. Richelieu is one of the most spirited, amusing, and interesting romances I ever read; characters well drawn—incidents well managed—story perpetually progressive—catastrophe at once natural and unexpected—moral good, but not goodly—and the whole felt, in every chapter, to be the work of a Gentleman."—Notes Ambrosianæ, April, 1830; Blackw. Mag., xxvii. 688, q. v.

From this time to the present (1856) Mr. James has been no idler in the Republic of Letters, as the following alphabetical list of his writings amply proves:

1. Adra, or The Peruvians; a Poem, 1 vol. 2. Agincourt, 1844, 3 vols. 3. Agnes Sorrel, 1853, 3 vols. 4. Arabella Stuart, 1853, 3 vols. 5. Arrah Neil, 1845, 3 vols. 6. Attila, 1837, 3 vols. 7. Prince Life, 1855, 1 vol. 62. Revenge, 1851, 3 vols.; so styled by the bookseller, without the author's consent. It was originally pub. in papers under a different name. 63. Richelieu, 1829, 3 vols. 64. Robber, 1838, 3 vols. 65. Ross D'Albret, 1840, 3 vols. 66. Russell, 1847, 3 vols. 67. Sir Theodore Broughton, 1847, 3 vols. 68. Smuggler, 1845, 3 vols. 69. Stepmother, 1846, 3 vols. 70. Story without a Name, 1852, 1 vol. 71. String of Pearls, 1849, 2 vols. 72. Ticoonderoga; or, The Black Eagle, 1854, 3 vols. 73. Whim and its Consequences, 1847, 3 vols. 74. Woodman, 1847, 3 vols. 75. Lord Montagu's Page, Phila., 1858, 12mo.

It will be seen that the above list presents a total of 189 vols.—viz.: 51 works in 3 vols. each, 2 in 4 vols. each, 6 in 2 vols. each, and 16 in 1 vol. each. Almost all of these vols. are of the post-octavo size. Mr. James is also the editor of the Vernon Letters, illustrative of the times of William III., 1841, 3 vols. 8vo; and of Wm. Henry Ireland's historical romance of David Rizzio, 1849, 3 vols. p. 8vo; and was associated with Dr. E. E. Crowe in the Lives of the Most Eminent Foreign Statesmen, 1832-38, 5 vols. p. 8vo, (4 vols. were Mr. James's, and 1 vol. Dr. Crowe's,) and with Mr. Maunsell B. Field, in the composition of Adrian, or The Clouds of the Mind, 1852, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

To this list may be added Norfolk and Hereford, (in a collection entitled Seven Tales by Seven Authors,) and enough articles in various periodicals to fill eight or ten volumes. Perhaps we should not omit to notice that a work entitled A Brief History of the United States Boundary Question, drawn up from official papers, pub. in London, 1839, 8vo, and ascribed to Mr. James, is not his production; nor had he any share (further than writing a preface, or something of that kind) in another work often credited to him,—Memoirs of Celebrated Women, 1837, 2 vols. p. 8vo. During the reign of William IV. the author received the appointment of historiographer of Great Britain; but this post was resigned by him many years since.

There have been new edits. of many of Mr. James's novels, and some or all of them have appeared in Bentley's Series of Standard Novels. There has been also a Parlor-Library Edition. A collective edit. was pub. by Smith, Elder & Co., commencing in June, 1844, and continued by Parry, and by Simpkin, Marshall & Co. In America they have been popular, and pub. in large quantities.

About 1850, Mr. James, with his family, removed permanently to the United States. He was British Consul at Richmond, Virginia, from 1852 to Sept. 1858, when he was appointed Consul at Venice, where he now (1858) resides. The space which we have occupied by a recital of the titles only of Mr. James's volumes necessarily restricts the quotation of criticisms upon the merits or demerits of their contents. It has fallen to the lot of few authors to be so much read, and at the same time so much abused, as the owner of the fertile pen which claims the long list of novels commencing with Richelieu in 1829 and extending to Lord Montagu's Page in 1858. That there should be a family likeness in this numerous race—where so many, too, are nearly of an age—can be no matter of surprise. The mind, like any other artisan, can only construct from materials which lie within its range; and when no time is allowed for the accumulation and renewal of these, it is vain to hope that variety of architecture will conceal the identity of substance. Yet, after all, the champion of this popular author will probably argue that this objection against the writings of Mr. James is greatly overstated and extravagantly overestimated. The novelist can draw only from the experience of human life in its different phases, and these admit not of such variety as the inordinate appetite of the modern Athenians unreasonably demands. A new series of catastrophes and perplexities, of mortifications and triumphs, of joys and sorrows, cannot be evoked for the benefit of the reader of each new novel. Again, Mr. James's admirer insists that this charge of sameness so often urged against our novelist's writings is perhaps overstated. Where one author, as is frequently the case, gains the reputation of versatility of talent by writing one or two volumes, it is not to be believed that Mr. James exhibits less in one or two hundred. He who composes a library is not to be judged by the same standard as he who writes but one book. And even if the charge of "sameness" be admitted to its full extent, yet many will cordially concur with the grateful and graceful acknowledgment of one of the most eminent of modern critics:

"I had every fresh publication of James, though I half know what he is going to do with his lady, and his gentleman, and his landscape, and his mystery, and his orthodoxy, and his criminal trial. But I am charmed with the new amusement which he brings out of old materials. I look on him as I look on a musician famous for 'variations.' I am grateful for his vein of cheerfulness, for his singularly varied and vivid landscapes, for his power of painting women at once ladylike and loving, (a rare talent,) for making lovers to match, at once beautiful and well-bred, and for the solace which all this has afforded me, sometimes over and over again, in illness and in convalescence, when I required interest without violence, and entertainment at once animated and mild."—LIZON HUNT.

Two of the severest criticisms to which Mr. James's novels have been subjected are, the one in the London Athenaeum for April 11, 1846, and the one in the North American Review (by E. P. Whipple) for April, 1844. From each of these we quote a few lines:

"The first and most obvious contrivance for the attainment of quantity is, of course, Dilution; but this recourse has practically its limit, and Mr. James had reached it long ago. Commonplace in its best day, any thing more feeble, rapid,—sloppy, in fact, (for we know not how to characterize this writer's style but by some of its own elegancies,)—than Mr. James's manner has become, it were difficult to imagine. Every literary grace has been swamped in the spreading maramus of his style."—Athenaeum: ubi supra.

"He is a most scientific expositor of the fact that a man may be a maker of books without being a maker of thoughts; that he may be the reputed author of a hundred volumes and flood the market with his literary wares, and yet have very few ideas and principles for his stock in trade. For the last ten years he has been repeating his own repetitions and echoing his own echoes. His first novel was a shot that went through the target, and he has ever since been assiduously firing through the hole. . . . When a man has little or nothing to say, he should say it in the smallest space. He should not, at any rate, take up more room than suffices for a creative mind. He should not provoke hostility and petulance by the effrontery of his demands upon time and patience. He should let us off with a few volumes, and gain our gratitude for his benevolence, if not our praise for his talents."—E. P. WHIPPLE: ubi supra, and in his Essays and Reviews, ii. 116-137.

We have spoken of Mr. James's champions and admirers; and such are by no means fabulous personages, notwithstanding the severe censures of which we have just exhibited specimens. A brief quotation from one of these eulogies will be another evidence added to the many in this volume of a wide dissimilarity in critical opinions:

"His pen is prolific enough to keep the imagination constantly nourished; and of him, more than of any modern writer, it may be said, that he has improved his style by the mere dint of constant and abundant practice. For, although as agreeable a novelist, it must not be forgotten that he stands so agreeably as an historian. . . . The most fantastic and beautiful conceptions which the skies can exhibit to the eyes of mankind dart as if in play from the huge volumes that roll out from the crater of the volcano. The recreation of an enlarged intellect is ever more valuable than the highest efforts of a confined one. Hence we find in the works before us, (Corse de Leon, The Ancient Régime, and The Jacquerie,) lightly as they have been thrown off, the traces of study,—the foot-steps of a powerful and vigorous understanding."—Dublin University Magazine, March, 1842.

The Edinburgh Review concludes some comments upon our author with the remark,

"Our readers will perceive from these general observations that we estimate Mr. James's abilities, as a romance-writer, highly: his works are lively and interesting, and animated by a spirit of sound and healthy morality in feeling, and of natural delineation in chaacter, which, we think, will secure for them a calm popularity which will last beyond the present day."

We have before us more than thirty (to be exact, just thirty-two) commendatory notices of our author, but brief extracts from two of these is all for which we can find space.

"He belongs to the historical school of fiction, and, like the masters of the art, takes up a real person or a real event, and, pursuing the course of history, makes out the intentions of nature by adding circumstances and heightening character, till, like a statue in the hands of the sculptor, the whole is in fair proportion, truth of sentiment, and character. For this he has high qualities,—an excellent taste, extensive knowledge of history, a right feeling of the chivalrous, and a heroic and a ready eye for the picturesque: his proprieties are admirable; his sympathy with whatever is high-souled and noble is deep and impressive. His best works are Richelieu and Mary of Burgundy."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833.

The critic next to be quoted, whilst coinciding in the objections prominently urged against Mr. James as an author,—repetition, tediousness, and deficiency of terseness,—yet urges on his behalf that "There is a constant appeal in his brilliant pages not only to the pure and generous, but to the elevated and noble sentiments; he is imbued with the very soul of chivalry; and all his stories turn on the final triumph of those who are influenced by such feelings over such as are swayed by selfish or base desires. He possesses great pictorial powers, and a remarkable facility of turning his graphic pen at will to the delineation of the most distant and opposite scenes, manners, and social customs. . . . Not a word or a thought which can give pain to the purest heart ever escapes from his pen; and the mind wearied with the cares and grieved at the selfishness of the world reverts with pleasure to his varied compositions, which carry it back, as it were, to former days, and portray, perhaps in too brilliant colours, the ideas and manners of the olden time."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815-52, chap. v., 1853. James, Maria, b. in Wales about 1795, emigrated to America in her seventh year, and since the age of ten has lived at service with a number of families, whose regard she has secured by the excellence of her deportment and her intellectual abilities. In 1833 some of her compositions fell into the hands of Professor Alonso Potter, D.D., of Union College, now the esteemed Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Pennsylvania, and in 1839 he introduced a collection of them to the public under the title of Wales, and other Poems, by Maria James. Some specimens of Miss James's poetry will be found in Griswold's Female Poets of America.

James, Richard, 1692-1638, a native of Newport, Isle of Wight, educated at Exeter and Corpus Christi Colleges, Oxford, pub. a number of sermons, &c., 1625-33, and left many MS. pieces. This learned critic and antiquary was a nephew of Thomas James, D.D., Sub-dean of Wells. See Athen. Oxon.; Biog. Brit., Supp.; Bp. Nicolson's Hist. Lib.; Lon. Gent. Mag., xxxvii. 336.

James, Robert, M.D., 1703-1776, the inventor of the celebrated Fever Powder, was a native of Staffordshire, and educated at St. John's College, Oxford. His best-known work is A Medicinal Dictionary, Lon., 1743-45, 3 vols. fol. His Vindication of the Fever Powder was not pub. until after his death. See Chalmers's Biog. Diet.; Boswell's Life of Johnson. Dr. Johnson, who always had a propensity for dabbling in physic, furnished some of the articles for the Medicinal Dictionary, and observed of Dr. James, "No man brings more mind to his profession."

Johnson also wrote the Dedication (and nothing of his is more truly "Johnsonese,") to Dr. Mead.

James, Thomas, D.D., 1571?-1629, a native of Newport, Isle of Wight, educated at and Fellow of (1593) New College, Oxford; appointed Keeper (the first one) of the Bodleian Library, 1602; resigned this post in 1620; Sub-dean of Wells, 1614, and subsequently Rector of Mongeham, Kent. His best-known work is A Treatise of the Corruption of Scriptures, Councils, and Fathers, by the Prelates, Pastors, and Pillars of the Church of Rome, for Maintenance of Popery and Irreligion, Lon., 1612, 4to; 1688, 8vo; edited by Rev. J. E. Cox, 1843, 8vo. A new ed. of his Bellum Papale (first ed., 1600, 4to, again, 1678, 8vo) was pub. in 1841, 12mo. We have already noticed his Catalogue of the Bodleian Library in the Life of Sir Thomas Bodley. Dr. James was one of the most learned critics of his day. See Athen. Oxon.; Biog. Brit., Supp.; Genl. James, Thomas C., M.D., 1766-1835, an eminent physician, a native of Philadelphia, Penn., graduated as a student of medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1788, and in 1811 was appointed Professor of Midwifery in the same institution. He practised his profession in his native city with great success until his death. Dr. James was an accomplished scholar, and contributed to the Philadelphia Port-Folio, under the signature of P. D., translations in verse of the Idyls of Geassner, which were highly commended. See Williams's Amer. Med. Biog.; Phila. Casket, March, 1830; Amer. Med. Jour., (art. by Hugh L. "This book is one of which it is not too high praise to assert, that it approaches as nearly to perfection, in its own line, as any historical work perhaps ever did; and we must acknowledge that we cannot contemplate without admiration the impartial and unwearied zeal for historical truth which alone could have supported the author through his tedious and thankless labours."—Edin. Rev.

Highly commended by other authorities.

"Mr. TUCKER.—'A Naval History is a very good thing, if written by a competent person, which James is not, although the man has some merit as a chronicler. But the very idea of criticising in detail every action, just as you would criticise a volume of poems, is not a little absurd. Southey's Life of Nelson is good.'

Jameson, Mrs. Anna, a daughter of Mr. Murphy, late painter-in-ordinary to the Princess Charlotte, was married about 1824 to Mr. Jameson, who has for many years held an official appointment in Canada. This union "proved less fortunate in its issues than in its promises, and has long been practically, though not legally, dissolved." The works of this lady have long enjoyed an extensive popularity, and few writers of the age have done so much to refine the public taste and diffuse a knowledge of the great masters of art. 1. The Diary of an Ennuyée, written during a Tour in Italy, Lon., 1826, sm. 8vo. 4. Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language, Edin., 1808–09, 2 vols. 4to, £4 4s. Abridged edit., 1818, 8vo, 14s. Supp. to the large edit., 1825, 2 vols. 4to, making in all 4 vols. 4to, 1808–09, '25; 2d ed., enlarged, including Supp., edited by John Johnstone, Lon., 1840–44, 8 Parts in 4 vols. 4to. Parts 1–4 comprise a new ed. of the Dictionary; Parts 5–8 a new ed. of the Supp. Only 350 copies were pub., at £8 8s. Abridged, 1846, 8vo, £1 1s.; 1850, 8vo, 12s. This is one of the most valuable lexicographical works ever issued. The erudition, patience, and industry of the author are beyond praise: his accuracy, however, is not always beyond question. But who is to decide where there must be so much of mere conjecture? We may be allowed to suggest that the philologist should secure, as a companion for Jamieson's Dictionary, Dictionarium Scoto-Celticum, pub. by The Highland Society, 1825, 2 vols. 4to, £7 7s.; large paper, £10 10s.; condensed edit., with additional words, £1 1s. This excellent work, on which Drs. McLeod and Dewar expended much labour, is for the Gaelic (or Celtic dialect of Scotland) what Dr. Jamieson's is for the pure Scottish. A review of the last-named work will be found in Edin. Rev., xiv.

121–145. 5. Hermes Scythicus; or, The Radical Affinities of the Greek and Latin Languages to the Gothic, 1814, 8vo. "This book is perhaps the most interesting, the most beautiful, and the cheapest series ever offered to the public."—Lon. Athenæum.

The illustrations, apart from the descriptive matter, were issued in 1846, &c. in Parts at 5s. each. In the preparation of this valuable series, Sir Wm. Jardine was assisted by Swainson, Waterhouse, Macgillivray, Bushnan, Selby, Seaburgh, Col. Hamilton Smith, Dr. Hamilton, and the Rev. James Duncan. Each vol. (sold separately) contains a memoir of a celebrated naturalist. Sir Thomas Dick Lauder and Capt. Thomas Brown commenced in November, 1833, the issue of The Miscellany of Natural History, the design of which, the London Athenæum declares, was taken from the work just noticed. "I never read a thing with more pleasure than an additional sheet to Jarvis's preface to Don Quixote: before I got over two paragraphs I cried out, 'Ant Erasmus, ant Diabolus!'"—FORB.

The most beautiful edit. of Don Quixote in English is that pub. by Tilt in London, 1838, 3 vols. 8vo, £3 10s.; again, 1843, 2 vols. r. 8vo; again, by Willoughby, 1852, 2 vols. r. 8vo, £2 1s.; 2 vols. in 1, 8vo, 10s. 6d. This is Jarvis's trans. revised and corrected, with 800 wood-engravings, after the designs of Tony Johannot, and 16 addit. plates by Cosmo Armstrong. A revised trans. for general reading, with illustrations by Warren, was pub. by Burns in London, in 1848, sp. 8vo, 6s. This is the proper edit. for the ladies' parlour. Another revised trans., formed on those of Motteux, Jarvis, and Smollett, with 18 cuts by Armstrong, and 32 after Johannot, was pub. in London in 1842, £1 8s.; the same, with only the usual 18 cuts by Armstrong, 18s.

"Well adapted, by its accuracy, comprehensiveness, and the popular language in which it is expressed, to be a proper and valuable book for the purpose which it was designed to fill."—JOHN O. WALKER, M.D., of Boston.

Commended by other high authorities. Dr. Jarvis has pub. a number of pamphlets on various branches of medical science, and contributed to the leading American medical journals.

Jarvis, Samuel Farmer, D.D., LL.D., 1787-1851, a son of Bishop Jarvis, (ante), and a native of Middletown, Conn., was educated at Yale College, ordained deacon in 1810, and priest in 1811; Rector of St. Michael's Church, Bloomingdale, New York, 1811; of St. James's, New York, (held in conjunction with the former), 1813; Prof. of Biblical Criticism in the (Episcopal) General Theological Seminary, New York, 1819-20; first Rector of St. Paul's Church, Boston, 1820-26; travelled in Europe, 1826-35; Prof. of Oriental Literature in Washington (now Trinity) College, Hartford, 1835-37; Rector of Christ Church, Middletown, 1837-43; appointed Historiographer of the Church by the General Convention (Prot. Episc. Church) of 1838. From 1843 until his death Dr. Jarvis devoted his time chiefly to the preparation of an ecclesiastical history, (commended to his care by the General Convention of 1838), portions of which were pub. in 1844 and 1850. See Nos. 5, 8. 1. A Discourse on the Religion of the Indian Tribes of North America, N. York, 1820, 8vo. Favourably reviewed by John Pickering in the N. Amer. Rev., July, 1820. 2. "Dr. Jarvis has exhibited accuracy and fidelity as an historian, the ripest judgment and the clearest reasoning as a commentator upon the intricate authorities on which he had to build his foundation for inquiry, and has shown himself an accomplished scholar, fully equal to the task committed to his charge. The work is a foundation on which the Christian historian and theologian may build; for the materials are solid, and the work admirably executed."—Lon. Polytechnic Review.

"A learned work on New Testament Chronology, by an American divine (Dr. Jarvis, of Connecticut) of standing and reputation. It is quite pleasant to find the daughter-church rearing chronologists and scholars; and we commend Dr. J.'s undertaking to the candid estimate and patronage of the learned."—Lon. Chris. Remembr.

"The general learning and ability, and especially the prudence, the mildness, and the firmness of his character, eminently fitted Mr. Jay to be the head of such a court, [Supreme Court of the United States.] When the spotless crimes of the judicial robe fall on John Jay, it touched nothing less spotless than itself."—*HON. Jay, William, 1769-1854, an eminent Dissenting divine, a native of Tisbury, Wiltshire, commenced preaching when between 15 and 16 years of age, and before he was 21 had delivered nearly 1000 sermons. On the 31st of Jan. 1791, he became the minister of Argyle Chapel, Bath, and remained in this situation until June, 1853, or for sixty-two years. In Jan. 1841, on the completion of the 50th year of his ministry, the jubilee was celebrated by religious services in the chapel, and by a feast in the Assembly Rooms, where 820 persons sat down together to breakfast. A silver and £650 were presented to the object of this gratifying token of respect. To the volume pub. on this occasion,—Jubilee Memorial, 1841, 12mo,—to Jay's Autobiography, edited by Rev. Geo. Redford and Rev. J. Angell James, 1854, 8vo, (3d ed., 1855, p. 8vo), to the Memoir of Jay, by Rev. S. S. Wilson, 1854, 8vo, to Wallace's Portraiture of Jay, with Notes of his Conversations, &c., and to Pen-Pictures of Popular English Preachers, 1852, 12mo, we refer the reader for information respecting this excellent divine. The best-known of Jay's works are Morning and Evening Exercises, (vols. i.-iv., 1842, of the collective ed. of his Works); The Christian Contemplated, (vol. vi., 1843, of his Works); Short Discourses, (vols. x. and xii., 1844, of his Works); and Mornings with Jesus, 1854, 8vo. The collective ed. to which we refer is in 12 vols. 8vo, Bath, 1842-44, (N. York, 3 vols. 8vo), and was corrected and revised by the author himself. To these 12 vols. must be added Lectures on Female Scripture Characters, 1854, cr. 8vo; Mornings with Jesus, 1854, 8vo; Evenings with Jesus; and Final Discourses at Argyle Chapel, Bath, 1854, 8vo. As a preacher, as well as an author, Mr. Jay has acquired great celebrity. John Foster calls him the Prince of Preachers; Sheridan styled him the most natural orator whom he had ever heard; Dr. James Hamilton speaks of hearing him "with wonder and delight;" and Beckford describes his mind as "a clear, transparent stream, flowing so freely as to impress us with the idea of its being inexhaustible."

His sermons, too,—not always the case with the effusions of popular preachers,—will bear the dispassionate judgment of the closet without lessening the reputation of their author.

"Mr. Jay's sermons, although a little too warmly coloured, have, upon the whole, great merit as honest and impassioned expositions of the several texts which are handled."—Didon's Lib. Comp.

"Eloquent and pious."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"Happily connects privilege and practice."—Bickersteth's C. S.

His sermons, like his other publications, are universally admired, and permanently fixed the writer's reputation. . . . One great charm of this divine's works is the catholic spirit which pervades them. The dissenter seldom intrudes, the sectarian never appears; and Christians of all denominations may read his productions without finding any violence done to their party predilections."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 657, 908.

Jefferson, Thomas, April 2, 1743-July 4, 1826, a native of Shadwell, Albemarle county, Virginia, entered William and Mary College in 1760, and subsequently studied law under George Wythe. In 1769 he was elected a member of the Colonial Assembly, and in 1775 succeeded Peyton Randolph in the National Congress at Philadelphia, and on the 28th of June, in the next year, as chairman of the committee appointed for that purpose, reported the celebrated Declaration of Independence, which, with some alterations, was adopted on the 4th of July ensuing. How far Mr. Jefferson is entitled to the credit of the entire originality of this famous document, the reader will be able to form an opinion after consulting the works of John Adams, of Thomas Jefferson, and the biographies of these distinguished statesmen and patriots. See also an interesting article upon this topic in George Ticknor Curtis's History of the Constitution of the United States, vol. i., 1854, pp. 81-88. It is neither our business nor our pleasure to adjudicate on questions of state-paper, history or political partisanship in a volume of this character, but we may be allowed to say that Jefferson's claim to the authorship of the Declaration of Independence seems as fully substantiated as the nature of the case will possibly allow. From 1779 to '81 Mr. Jefferson was Governor of his native State; in 1783 was again elected a member of Congress; from 1784 to '89 resided at Paris, succeeding Franklin in 1785 as minister from the United States; in 1789 he was appointed by General Washington Secretary of State, which office he held until 1793; was Vice-President of the United States 1797-1801, and President of the Republic 1801-09. Mr. Jefferson had now reached an age when the duties of public life were no longer inviting, and he passed his remaining years at Monticello, dividing his time between his plantation, his library, and the entertainment of the many visitors attracted to his mansion by his widely-extended reputation at home and abroad. He died on the same day as that which closed the earthly existence of John Adams,—the 4th of July, 1826.

As an author, Mr. Jefferson is best known by his Notes on the State of Virginia, (originally drawn up for M. De Marbois,) of which 200 copies were privately printed at Paris in 1784, (but dated 1782,) 8vo. A French translation, by the Abbé Morellet, with some alterations by the author, appeared at Paris in 1786, 8vo, and an edit. of the original in English was pub. by Stockdale in London in 1787, 8vo.

But on this subject we can give nothing more satisfactory to the reader than the following table, (drawn up by a well-known American historian and bibliographer,) which we find in The Historical Magazine, Boston, Feb. 1857, vol. i., No. 2, p. 52.

"JEFFERSON'S NOTES ON VIRGINIA.—The following is a list of the several editions of this work, as far as ascertained. Those with a * prefixed have been collated. They are all 8vo except when otherwise marked:

* * Editio princeps, Paris, 1782; pp. 301; plate of Mammoth Cave.

* * French edition, Paris, 1786; pp. viii., 300, iv., map.

* * 1st English do., Stockdale, London, 1787; pp. ii., 382; map.

* * 1st American do., Pritchard and Hall, Philadelphia, 1788; pp. ii., 244.

* * 2d American do., Philadelphia, 1788; pp. ii., 336.

* * Another do., Philadelphia, 1792; ii., 336.

* * Another do., Carey, Philadelphia, 1794; ii., 336; map.

* * Appendix to Notes, Smith, Philadelphia, 1800; pp. 51; woodcut.

* * Notes; American edition, Baltimore, 1800.

* * 3d American edition, M. L. Davis, New York, 1801; pp. 392; portrait; map; two woodcuts.

* * 1st hot-pressed do., Rawle, Philadelphia, 1801; pp. ii., 436, 56; portrait; map; two plans, and view of Natural Bridge.

* * 8th American do., Curliet, Boston, 1801; pp. 364; portrait; map; two woodcuts.

* * 9th American do., Sprague, Boston, 1802; 12mo, pp. 368; map.

* * Another do., Trenton, N.J., 1803; 12mo, extra fine paper.

* * Another do., New York, 1804; best ed.; pp. 392.

* * Another do., Hogan and Thompson, Philadelphia, 1825; 12mo.

* * Another do., Boston, 1832.

* * Last edition, Randolph, Richmond, 1853; 3 ff. pp. 275; map; four lithographs; one folding sheet of letter-press.

It will be noticed that very little order seems to have obtained in numbering the editions. That called the 3d American appears to have been the 6th in succession; the 1st hot-pressed, the 7th; and so forth. Perhaps some of your readers may be able to contribute to the above list. Were there not any editions during Mr. Jefferson's second term as President?

R. B. O'C."

The last ed., above noticed, was printed from Mr. Jefferson's own copy, with his MS. annotations, intended apparently for a new issue. We may state that Mr. Randolph has now, (Jan. 1857,) or had a few weeks since, on sale, this copy of Mr. Jefferson's, which is priced at $100. Nor must we omit to notice Mr. Randolph's enterprise in republishing the History of the University of Virginia, as detailed in the Correspondence of Mr. Jefferson and Joseph C. Cabell, Richmond, 1856, 8vo. Of these letters of Jefferson's, all, with the exception of eight, are now given to the world for the first time. Ample information respecting the character of the Notes on Virginia will be found in the authorities referred to in the course of this article. As Stevenson's Catalogue of Voyages and Travels, however, is now rarely to be met with, it may be worth while to quote his opinion of the work:

"Notes on Virginia, by Thos. Jefferson, 1785, 8vo. Politics, commerce, manufacture, and navigation, are here treated of in a satisfactory and instructive manner, but with rather too much the air of philosophy."—P. 623.

In 1829 was pub., by Jefferson's grandson, Memoirs, Correspondence, and Private Papers of Thomas Jefferson, edited by Thomas Jefferson Randolph, 4 vols. 8vo, Charlottesville, Va.; reprinted in London and in Boston in the same year, and in New York in 1830; all in 4 vols. 8vo. But recently there has appeared a more important publication,—viz.: The Writings of Thomas Jefferson; being his Autobiography, Correspondence, Reports, Messages, Addresses, and other Writings, official and private; from the original manuscripts deposited in the Department of State. With Explanatory Notes, tables of contents, and a copious Index to each volume, as well as an Index to the whole, N. York, 1854, 9 vols. 8vo. By the Editor, H. A. Washington. This edit. is from the MSS. bequeathed to Thomas Jefferson Randolph, the author's grandson, and purchased by Congress in 1848. The reader is also referred—in addition to the histories of the Revolutionary period—to the following biographies of Jefferson: by Professor George Tucker, Phila. and Lon., 1837, 2 vols. 8vo; by Wm. Linn, Ithaca, N. Y., 1834, 12mo; by B. L. Rayner, Bost., 1834, 12mo; by H. A. Garland; by Theodore Dwight, 1839, 12mo. See also Observations on the Writings of Thomas Jefferson, by H. Lee, of Virginia, N. York, 1832, 8vo, 1839, 8vo, 1845, 8vo, with addit. notes by C. C. Lee, of Powhatan, in answer to George Tucker's Remarks in his Life of Jefferson; The Youth of Jefferson, a Chronicle of College Scrapes at Williamsburg, in Virginia, 1855, 12mo. It is worthy of observation that Jefferson's Manual of Parliamentary Practice (trans. into French by L. A. Pichon, Paris, 1814, 8vo) is still in use, and deferred to as an authority at Washington and elsewhere, and an edit. has been pub. within the last three or four years. It is incorporated in Sutherland's excellent Congressional Manual, of which the 2d edit. appeared in 1846, Phila., 18mo. It may be expected that we should not conclude a notice, however hasty and imperfect, of the writings of Thomas Jefferson, without cautioning the reader against the pernicious influence of those portions of his lucubrations which assail the divine authority of the Scriptures. But, indeed, it is hardly conceivable that any intelligent and candid mind could be perverted by the crudities and self-contradictory sophisms which distinguish the theological speculations of the "Sage of Monticello." The effect produced on our own mind—when as yet very young and inexperienced in the inconsistencies of mental physiology—by the perusal of a portion of Jefferson's famous letters to William Short was that of astonishment that a mind apparently so inert and obtuse in metaphysics could evince vigour and acuteness in political philosophy. That remarkable exhibition of theologia dogmatica, Jefferson's Plutarchian contrast between his own creed and that of the Founder of Christianity, would amuse us by its egotism, did it not shock us by its irreverence. But, with whatever mortification a spectacle so humiliating may be regarded by the infidel, Christianity has nothing to fear even from much more formidable opposition.

A graphic sketch of Mr. Jefferson's appearance, manners, and conversation, will be found in a letter of Judge Joseph Story to Mr. Fay, dated Washington, May 30, 1847, (see Story's Life and Corresp., i. 151-152;) and an account of equal interest will be published in a few days in the Private Correspondence of Daniel Webster, vol. i. 364-373. Mr. Webster was so thoughtful as to preserve an extended memoranda of Mr. Jefferson's remarks; and they will well repay perusal. Perhaps we cannot make a better use of a portion of the small space to which we are confined in this article than by devoting it to Mr. Webster's summing up of the evidence in favour of Jefferson's claim to the authorship of the Declaration of Independence:

"The merit of this paper is Mr. Jefferson's. Some changes were made in it at the suggestion of other members of the committee, and others by Congress while it was under discussion. But none of them altered the tone, the frame, the arrangement, or the general character, of the instrument. As a composition, the Declaration is Mr. Jefferson's. It is the production of his mind, and the high honour of it belongs to him clearly and absolutely. To say that he performed his great work well would be doing him injustice. To say that he did excellently well, admirably well, would be inadequate and halting praise. Let us rather say that he so discharged the duty assigned him, that all Americans may well rejoice that the work of drawing the title-deed of their liberties devolved upon him."—A Discourse in Commemoration of the Lives and Services of John Adams and Thomas Jefferson; delivered in Faneuil Hall, Boston, Aug. 2, 1826: Webster's Works, 1854, i. 126, 127.

To the same effect another distinguished orator, and on a like occasion, remarks:

"On the seventh of June, the resolution of independence was moved by Richard Henry Lee. On the eleventh, a committee of five was chosen to announce this resolution to the world; and Thomas Jefferson and John Adams stood at the head of this committee. From their designation by ballot to this most honorable duty, their prominent standing in the Congress might alone be inferred. In their amicable contention and deference each to the other of the great trust of composing the all-important document, we witness their patriotic disinterestedness and their mutual respect. This trust devolved on Jefferson, and with it rests on him the imperishable renown of having penned the Declaration of Independence. To have been the instrument of expressing, in one brief, decisive act, the concentrated will and resolution of a whole family of States; of unfolding, in one all-important manifesto, the causes, the motives, and the justification of this great movement in human affairs; to have been permitted to give the impress and peculiarity of his own mind to a charter of public right, destined—or, rather, let me say, already elevated—to an importance, in the estimation of men, equal to any thing human, ever borne on parchment, or expressed in the visible signs of thought,—this is the glory of Thomas Jefferson."—EDWARD EVERETT: Eulogy on Adams and Jefferson, 1st of Aug. 1826. Everett's Orations and Speeches, 1853, i. 131-149.

From an historical sketch of the public life of Jefferson, by an eminent orator, still (1857) in the vigorous exercise of his remarkable faculties at the ripe age of almost fourscore, we extract a few lines which will be accepted in whole, or with more or less reservation, as the political judgment of our readers may incline.

"After Washington and Franklin, there is no person who fills so eminent a place among the great men of America as Jefferson. Whether we regard his important services in the Revolutionary contest, or his subsequent assertion of the principles upon which the separation was undertaken,—both while he filled a subordinate station in Washington's presidency, thwarted by his colleagues, as well as at variance with his chief, and while he administered himself the government of that free and prosperous country,—no reasonable doubt can be entertained, that to his enlightened views and to the firmness of his character it is indebted for much of that freedom and prosperity."—LORD BROUGHAM: Review of George Tucker's Life of Jefferson, Edin. Rev., 1837; and in Brougham's collected Contrib. to the Edin. Rev., Lon. and Glasg., 1856, iii. 443-452. See TUCKER, GEORGE.

Jeffrey, Francis, Lord, 1773-1850, a native of Edinburgh, the eldest son of George Jeffrey, Under-Clerk in the Court of Sessions, was sent to the University of Glasgow in 1787, and removed in 1791 to Queen's College, Oxford, where he remained but one session. In 1794 he was admitted an advocate at the Scotch Bar, where his services were so seldom called into requisition that he declared, so late as 1803, he had never yet made £100 in any one year by his profession. At the Speculative Society, in Edinburgh, he became acquainted with a number of young men of decided abilities, and, like himself, anxious aspirants after fame and fortune; and with two of these—Sydney Smith and Henry Brougham—he formed a literary intimacy which resulted in the establishment of the Edinburgh Review, originated by Smith, but confided to the editorial care of Jeffrey after the publication of the first three numbers. This responsible post was held by Jeffrey from July, 1803, to June, 1829, when he withdrew from the chair of the critic to occupy the post of Dean of the Faculty of Advocates, an office of distinction at the Scottish Bar. In 1830, Mr. Jeffrey was appointed Lord-Advocate; in February, 1831, he took his seat in Parliament, where he continued for more than three years, and in 1834 succeeded Lord Craigie in the Court of Session,—which position gave him the honorary title of Lord Jeffrey. He so demeaned himself in his high office as to secure the favour of all classes with whom he was brought into contact, and many a poor author who had writhed under the galling pen of the critic considered himself compensated by the courteous accents and bland manners of the judge.

"His great courtesy to the bar, and his singular patience, might be taken as models of judicial demeanour. But who shall tell the almost magic charm that he imparted to the dull routine of a Court of Justice? That he touched nothing which he did not adorn was the least of his praise. How many sat daily there, listening to the wonderful words of that now remarkable sage, replete with wisdom, eloquence, and legal lore,—catching those bright jewels which he scattered as profusely over the rusty pages of a trumpery Record as if he were engaged on some immortal work! Let our young barristers who crowded that court-room tell how the dull shafts of legal argument came back from his quiver tipped with silver,—how strangely and wonderfully the bright flashes of his mind lighted up the darkest and dingiest recesses of the most technical walks of jurisprudence,—how known truths were decked, and dim, misty paths of logic were illumined, by his genius,—and how he seemed to have summoned the aid of all the Muses to assist at the solemnities of Themis. We may see great lawyers and great judges in our day, but we shall never look upon his like again."—North British Review, xlii. 283.

We should not omit to state that in 1820 Jeffrey was elected Lord-Rector of the University of Glasgow, a grateful tribute from his Alma Mater.

Of the personal appearance of Lord Jeffrey we have the following portrait:

"In person the subject of our memoir was of low stature; but his figure, which he tried to set off to the best advantage, was elegant and well proportioned. His features were continually varying in expression, and were said to have baffled our best artists. The face was rather elongated, the chin deficient, the mouth well formed, with a mingled expression of determination, sentiment, and mockery. The eye was the most peculiar feature of the countenance: it was large and sparkling, but with a want of transparency."—Sketches of the Scottish Bar.

It was in 1815 that Jeffrey "set up his rustic household-gods" at Craighook, near Edinburgh, where he continued to pass his summers until the year of his death. There he entertained his numerous guests in a manner of which Lord Cockburn has given us a graphic picture:

"No unofficial house in Scotland," says his Lordship, "has had a greater influence on literary or political opinion. Beautiful though the spot, as he has kept it, is, its deepest interest arises from its being the residence of such a man. Nothing can efface the days they have passed there from the recollection of his friends. Their rural festivities are dignified by his virtues and talents, by all our Edinburgh eminence, and by almost every interesting stranger. The Craighook Saturdays during the summer season!"—Lord Cockburn's Memorials of his Time, 1860.

Lord Jeffrey was married twice,—first, in 1804, to Catherine, daughter of the Rev. Dr. Wilson, of St. Andrew's; and secondly, in 1813, to Charlotte, daughter of Charles Wilkes, of New York, and grand-niece of the celebrated John Wilkes, of London.

The history of the Edinburgh Review is one of the most interesting pages in the annals of English Literature; and ample details respecting this periodical, and its influence upon letters, will be found in the authorities quoted from or referred to in this article, and in other works familiar to many of our readers. It was successful from the commencement; and in the space of six years the circulation had increased from 750 to about 9000. In 1813 the number of each copy printed was 12,000 to 13,000. The radical changes both in opinion and statutes introduced by its influence, at an early or later day, were remarkable indeed:

"To appreciate the value of the Edinburgh Review, the state of England at the period when that journal began should be had in remembrance. The Catholics were not emancipated—the Corporation and Test Act were unrepented—the Game-Laws were horribly oppressive, Steel-Traps and Spring-Guns were set all over the country—Prisoners tried for their lives could have no Counsel—Lord Eldon and the Court of Chancery pressed heavily upon mankind—Label was punished by the most cruel and vindictive imprisonment—the principles of Political Economy were little understood—the Law of Debt and the enormous wickedness of the Slave-Trade was tolerated—a thousand evils were in existence, which the talents of good and able men have since lessened or removed; and these effects have been not a little assisted by the honest boldness of the Edinburgh Review."—REV. SYDNEY SMITH, June, 1830: Preface to his Works.

"Previous to 1802, the literary periodicals of Great Britain were repositories of miscellanies relating to art, poetry, letters, and gossip,—partly original and partly selected,—huddled together without system, and making up a medley as varied and respectable as a first-class weekly newspaper of the present day. The criticisms of books were jejune in the extreme, consisting chiefly of a few smart witticisms and meagre connecting remarks, stringing together ample quotations from the work under review. They rarely ventured into deep water on philosophical subjects, and as seldom pushed out upon the tempestuous sea of political discussion. Perhaps one or two journals might plead a feeble exception to the general rule, but the mass were 'weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable.' The Edinburgh Review appeared. It bounded into the arena without the countenance of birth or station, without the imprimatur of the universities or literary clubs. Its avowed mission was to erect a higher standard of merit and secure a bolder and purer taste in literature, and to apply philosophical principles and the maxims of truth and humanity to politics, aiming to be the manual of the scholar, the monitor of the statesman. As in its advent it had asked permission of no-one to be, so, as to its future course, it asked no advice as to what it should do. Soliciting no quarter, promising no favours, its independent bearing and defiant tone broke the spell which held the mind of a nation in fetters. Its first number revived the discussion of great political principles. The splendid diction and searching philosophy of an essay on the causes and consequences of the French Revolution [written by Jeffrey] at once arrested the public eye, and stamped the character of the journal. Pedants in the pulpit, and scribblers of Rosa-Matilda verses in printed albums, saw, from other articles in the manifesto, that exterminating war was declared on their fanaticism and sentimentalities. The new journal was perused with avidity, and produced a sensation in all classes of readers, exciting admiration and envy, love and hatred, defiance and fear. It rapidly attained a large circulation, steadily rose to the highest position ever attained by any similar publication, reigned supreme in an empire of its own creation for a third of a century, accomplishing vast good mingled with no inconsiderable evil."—Stanley's Reformers and Reformers of Great Britain and Ireland.

"The commencement of the Edinburgh Review was the discovery of a new world in criticism, to which all authors were liable to be transported as criminals, and there dealt with according to laws made on the spot, and executed by those who made them. The speculation answered well, the adventurers grew rich and renowned, and their ambition increased with their wealth and celebrity."—JAMES MONRODORR: Lect. on General Lit., Poetry, &c.

But let us hear something on the other side:

"All were the better of a journal to which every one with an object of due importance had access, which it was in vain either to bully or to despise, and of the fame of which even its reasonable haters were inwardly proud. . . . Certainly it was not for want of warning that what were said to be its errors were persevered in. Its enemies, for several years, found great comfort in its abuse, which they vented in streams of pamphlets that make curious reading now. Instead of practising the moderation and candour the absence of which from the review is their great complaint, they almost uniformly exceed, by a hundredfold, most of the offences which they ascribe to it. But they are generally kind enough to admonish the wicked editor of the disgrace into which he is falling in the right of all good men, and of the speedy extinction of his abominable work."—LOAN COCKBURN: Life of Lord Jeffrey, vol. i. 1862.

"It was not the principles of the Edinburgh Review, but the spirit, that was looked at with jealousy and alarm. The principles were by no means decidedly hostile to existing institutions, but the spirit was that of fair and free discussion: a field was open to argument and wit; every question was tried upon its own ostensible merits, and there was no foul play. The tone was that of a studied impartiality, (which may be called trimming;) or of a sceptical indifference. This tone of impartiality and indifference, however, did not at all suit those who profited or existed by abuse, who breathed the very air of corruption. They knew well enough that 'those who are not for them are against them.'"—Hamilton's Spirit of the Age: Mr. Jeffrey.

"I hope you read the Edinburgh Review: it is far the best of our periodical publications. It is charged with severity; but the accusation is most loudly made by bad writers and their stupid admirers. For my part I am not displeased to see the laws of the republic of letters enforced with some rigour against delinquents who have too long enjoyed a scandalous impunity."—SIR JAMES MACINTOSH: Letter to Mr. Grote, Feb. 6, 1804; in Macintosh's Life, by his Son.

In connexion with Lord Cockburn's remarks, doubtless many amusing instances of indignant reviewed authorship will recur to the memory of our readers. Lord Byron's case we have already considered at large, and we now notice, in passing, the philosophical wrath of Wordsworth, who classed Robespierre, Buonaparte, and Jeffrey together as the three most formidable enemies of the human race who had appeared in his remembrance, and the school-boy petulance of Southey, who says that Jeffrey's review of Madoc (Edin. Rev., Oct. 1805) "is very unfair and very unconvincing."—Letter to Mrs. Southey, Oct. 16, 1805.

"To Jeffrey as an individual I shall ever be ready to show every kind of individual courtesy; but of Judge Jeffrey, of the Edinburgh Review, I must ever think and speak as a bad politician, a worse moralist, and a critic, in matters of taste, equally incompetent and unjust."—Letter to Walter Scott, Dec. 8, 1807; Southey's Life and Correspondence.

Is there any thing in the world more ridiculous than the wallings of an author over the wounds which the arrows of criticism have inflicted upon his literary offspring? From the days of the "enemy" of the patient Job, was there ever yet a man who "wrote a book," and saw that book in the hands of the executioner, who was not laughed at by the "sympathising public" for his lamentations or his revilings? We shall do well to remember these amiable comments of ours when our own leviathan of a volume is passing "under the saws and harrows" of the Phillistines.

Southey, indeed, had, long before the date of either of the remarks just quoted, expressed an unfavourable opinion of the Edinburgh periodical:

"Their philosophy appears in their belief in Hindoo chronology; and when they abuse Parr's style, it is rather a knock at the dead lion, old Johnson. A first number has great advantages; the reviewers say their say upon all subjects, and lay down the law: that contains the Institutes; by-and-by they can only comment."—Letter to C. W. Wynn, Dec. 22, 1802.

"The Edinburgh Review will not keep its ground. It consists of pamphlets instead of critical accounts."—Letter to S. T. Coleridge, March 14, 1803; Southey's Life and Correspondence.

But the "Edinburgh Review" has "kept its ground;" and many of its brilliant papers are, and always will be, read twenty times where Macao, or any other work of Southey's, is or will be read once.

Lord Jeffrey's contributions to the Edinburgh Review extend over a period of almost half a century,—the first (the first article in the first No., to which he contributed five papers), Moussier sur la Révolution de France,—bearing date October, 1802, and the last—Watt or Cavendish?—given to the world January, 1848. The 98th No., pub. June, 1829, was the last he edited; and the review of the Memoirs of Lady Fanshawe, which appeared in October, 1829, was the last article he furnished as a regular contributor. His only papers after this date were Naval Tactics, April, 1830; Memoirs of Sir J. Mackintosh, October, 1835; Wilberforce's Correspondence, October, 1840; Watt or Cavendish? January, 1848. A list of his articles—200 in all—will be found in the Appendix to Lord Cockburn's Life of the Author. His biographer, and other friends, had often urged him, but in vain, to designate his articles; but at last, in December, 1840, Lord Cockburn found him in a yielding mood, and number after number of the Review was brought under examination, until the whole had been subjected to a rigid scrutiny. The results we have already stated. In 1843, he consented, at the request of the publishers of the Review, to make a selection from his contributions for the purpose of republication, and in this year appeared Contributions to the Edinburgh Review, by Francis Jeffrey, 4 vols. 8vo, £2 8s.; 2d edit., 1846, 3 vols. 8vo, £2 2s.; 3d ed., 1853, 1 vol. 8vo, pp. 1005, £1 1s., with a general Index.

The contents of these editions are the same. Of the 199 articles which had been contributed to the Review, (the 200th was pub. in Jan. 1848,) we have in this collection only 79, which are thus classified:—I. General Literature and Literary Biography, 10 articles; II. History and Historical Memoirs, 10 articles; III. Poetry, 22 articles; IV. Philosophy of the Mind, Metaphysics, and Jurisprudence, 6 articles; V. Novels, Tales, and Prose Works of Fiction, 8 articles; VI. General Politics, 6 articles; VII. Miscellanies, 17 articles. At the close of the collection are added Notice of the Honourable Henry Erskine, from The Edinburgh Courant, Oct. 16, 1817; Notice and Character of Professor Playfair, from an Edinburgh paper of Aug. 1819; Notice and Character of James Watt, from the Scotsman, Sept. 4, 1819. It is proper to state that the article entitled BEAUTE, contributed by Jeffrey to the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica in 1824, (but prepared, Lord Cockburn says, in 1816,) is an enlargement of his review of Alison's Nature and Principles of Taste, pub. in the Edinburgh Review, May, 1811. In Jeffrey's collected Contributions to the Edinburgh Review, the article Beauty appears in its complete form as pub. in the Encyclopædia Britannica. We quote two rather antagonistic opinions upon this essay:

"Of all the treatises that have been published on the theory of taste, it is the most complete in its philosophy and the most delightful in its writing; and it is as sound as the subject admits of."—Lord Cockburn: Life of Lord Jeffrey, vol. I.

"Few works of the kind are more questionable in the principle, or more loose in the arrangement and argument."—Lyall's Apologies, or, Philosophical Structures, &c., Lon., 1866, 18-44.

There are still 121 of Jeffrey's contributions to the Edinburgh Review uncollected. This should be so no longer. Those subjects of his criticism who would have been aggrieved by the republication of the strictures of the reviewer have almost all passed away, and, if their reputation is so frail as to be affected by a little good-humoured ridicule, it is not worth preservation.

Our curious friends will be gratified to know that the authors of many of the articles in the Edinburgh Review will be found in the London Gentleman's Magazine for 1845, Pt. 1, 497-500, (articles in vols. I.-xv.); ibid., Pt. 2, 585-589, (articles in vols. xvi.-xxvii.)

A list of the authors of many of the contributions to the Quarterly Review will be found in the Gent. Mag. for 1844, Pt. 1, 137-141, (articles in vols. I.-xix.); ibid., Pt. 1, 577-580, (articles in vols. xxi.-xxxix.); 1845, Pt. 1, 599-602, (articles in vols. xli.-lix.); 1847, Pt. 2, 34-37, (articles in vols. lxi.-lxxviii.)

An interesting history of the Review and its contributors will be found in Lord Cockburn's Life of Lord Jeffrey. See also a paper on the originators of the Quarterly, in Gent. Mag., 1844, Pt. 1, p. 246; and see our Life of William Gifford, in this Dictionary.

We have already intimated that the formidable critic was a most agreeable companion,—that the lion of the Review was the lamb of the dinner-table and evening circle. Sometimes, however, even Jeffrey's politeness was not proof against boredom. There was "a time with him when patience ceased to be a virtue." Of one of these instances of human frailty we have an amusing account by Lady Holland:

"The reigning bore at this time in Edinburgh was —; his favourite subject, the North Pole. It mattered not how far south you began, you found yourself transported to the North Pole before you could take breath. No one escaped him. My father declared he should invent a slip button. Jeffrey fled from him as from the plague, when possible; but one day his arch-tormentor met him in a narrow lane, and began instantly on the North Pole. Jeffrey, in despair, and out of all patience, darted past him, exclaiming, 'Hang the North Pole!' My father met him shortly after, boiling with indignation at Jeffrey's contempt of the North Pole. 'Oh, my dear fellow,' said my father, 'never mind; no one minds what Jeffrey says, you know; he is a privileged person; he respects nothing,—absolutely nothing. Why, you will scarcely believe it, but it is not more than a week ago that I heard him speak disrespectfully of the equator!'—Memoir of the Rev. Sydney Smith.

We may be permitted, in passing, to observe that, of Lord Jeffrey's 200 papers in the Edinburgh Review, almost if not quite every one is either quoted from or referred to in this Dictionary. This article is already sufficiently long, but we feel unwilling to close it without at least a few quotations,—without a few reviews of the great reviewer:

"He was not so much distinguished by the predominance of any one great quality as by the union of several of the finest. Rapidity of intellect, instead of misleading, as it often does, was combined in him with great soundness; and a high condition of the reasoning powers with an active and delightful fancy. Though not what is termed learned, his knowledge was various; and on literature, politics, and the philosophy of life, it was deep. A taste exquisitely delicate and largely exercised was one of the great sources of his enjoyment, and of his unmatched critical skill."—Lord Cockburn: Life of Lord Jeffrey.

"He is thoroughly acquainted with the progress and pretensions of modern literature and philosophy; and to this he adds the natural acuteness and discrimination of the logician with the habitual caution and coolness of his profession. . . . The characteristics of Mr. Jeffrey's general style as a writer correspond, we think, with what we have stated as the characteristics of his mind. He is a master of the foil: he makes an exulting display of the dazzling fence of wit and argument. His strength consists in a great range of knowledge, an equal familiarity with the principles and the details of a subject, and in a glancing brilliancy and rapidity of style. Indeed, we doubt whether the brilliancy of his manner does not resolve itself into the rapidity, the variety and aptness of his illustrations. His pen is never at a loss, never stands still; and would dazzle for this reason alone, like an eye that is ever in motion. Mr. Jeffrey is far from a flowery or affected writer: he has few tropes or figures, still less any odd startling thoughts or quaint innovations in expression; but he has a constant supply of ingenious solutions and pertinent examples; he never prosess, never grows dull, never wears an argument to tatters; and, by the number, the liveliness, and facility of his transitions, keeps that appearance of vivacity, of novel and sparkling effect, for which others are too often indebted to singularity of combination or tinsel ornaments."—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age.

No one denies all this: but less partial critics can see defects as well as beauties; and less partial critics therefore must be allowed to give an opinion in the premises:

"What then is wanting to enable him to fill the judgment-seat of criticism with honour to himself and with profit to others? He wants imagination. He not only has little imagination of his own, but he does not perceive that no work of genius can exist without it; that it is the preserving soul which makes works immortal. Wherever he has met with it, he looks upon it with the eye of contempt, and casts it from him, as the Arabs did the Oriental pearls in the wilderness. This is the chief secret of the scorn which he has heaped on the chief poets of the day: his reviews of Scott, Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, and Montgomery, all exhibit the original deficiency of the critic: they are not judged by their pens; he cannot judge them: they have risen beyond his reach, into the atmosphere of imagination. To his upturned and wondering eyes, such flights are folly, and he thinks that genius, like Antæus, must die when it forsakes the ground. Had Jeffrey possessed imagination, he would never have penned the insulting reviews to which I allude. His criticisms did great injury to the cause of literature; his sarcastic strictures tamed down the elastic and bounding spirit of man; poets wrote with the fear of the critic upon them, and dreaded the universal laugh of the world. Birds seldom sing well when the kite is in the air, and bards dreaded the Judge Jeffrey of our day as much as political offenders dreaded the Judge Jeffreys of James the Second. By criticisms such as this, true genius is defrauded of its fame for a time, and elegant and polished mediocrity prospers and flourishes. Where are many of the writers he has praised? gone to oblivion, with all their point and their glitter. Where are some of the writers he has traduced and abused? sitting on the highest pinnacles of fame."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833.

"Such being the nature of true Poets and true poetry, and such the light in which they are regarded by the race whom they elevate,—what, pray, it may be asked, did Mr. Jeffrey mean? Other day, by saying that all the Poets of this Age are forgotten? [See Edin. Rev., No. 95.] There are few people whom we love and admire more than Mr. Jeffrey,—though we believe he does not know it; but why will he, in his elegant and graceful way, speak such nonsense? Scott, Byron, Southey, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Moore, are, he assures us, already all forgotten—or nearly so,—fading away,—mere specks on the distant horizon of men's clouded memories! Why, our dear sir, you might just as well affirm that the stars are forgotten, because thousands of coachfuls of people, coming and going to and from evening parties, are not at the time aware that the heavens are full of them, that shepherds are watching by them on the hills, and sailors sailing by them on the seas, and astronomers counting them in observatories and occasionally discovering one that had been invisible to the mole-eyes of men since the creation. Yet in all the nonsense Mr. Jeffrey ever spoke, or may speak, you always may find some grains of sense: for who doubts his sagacity and his genius? Not one of our great or good living Poets is forgotten at this hour by Mr. Jeffrey himself, nor any of those critiques of his own, either, in which he did noble justice to some of them and ignoble injustice to others, according to the transient or permanent moods by which his taste, feeling, and judgment were swayed. Nor are his critiques themselves likely to be forgotten,—soon or ever; for many of them belong, we verily believe, to our philosophical literature. But they hold the tenure of their existence by the existence of the poetry which they sought to illustrate or obscure: from the 'golden urns of those Poets' did he 'draw light,'—the light in which he is himself conspicuous; and, were it extinguished, his literary life would be a blank."—Profraser Wilson's Blackw. Mag., Feb. 1830; and in his Essays Critical and Imaginative, Edin. and Lon., 1856, I. 365, 366. See also Blackw. Mag., June, 1828, or Essays, I. 245.

"Our very ideas of what is poetry," says Sir Walter Scott of Jeffrey, "differ so widely, that we rarely talk upon these subjects. There is something in his mode of reasoning that leads me greatly to doubt whether, notwithstanding the vivacity of his imagination, he really has any feeling of poetical genius, or whether he has worn it all off by perpetually sharpening his wit on the grindstone of criticism. . . . I should be glad for his own sake that he took some opportunity to retrace the paths of his criticism; but, after pledging himself so deeply as he has done, I doubt much his giving way, even unto conviction."—Sir Walter Scott to Joanna Baillie, Jan. 17 and April 4, 1812; Lockhart's Life of Scott.

"But, with my friend Jeffrey's pardon, I think he loves to see imagination best when it is bitted and managed, and ridden upon the grand pas. He does not make allowance for starts and sallies and bounds, when Pegasus is beautiful to behold, though sometimes perilous to his rider."—Scott's Diary, Jan. 1, 1827: ubi supra. "The celebrated editor of this work, [Edinburgh Review,] with little imagination, little genuine wit, and no clear view of any great and central principles of criticism, has contrived to lamba, to astonish, and occasionally to delight, multitudes of readers, and, at one period, to hold the temporary fate of authors at his will. His qualifications are all singularly adapted to his office. Without deep feeling, which few can understand, he has a quick sensibility, with which all sympathise; without a command of images, he has a glittering radiance of words which the most superficial may admire: neither too hard-hearted always to refuse his admiration, nor too kindly to suppress a sneer, he has been enabled to appear most witty, most wise, and most eloquent, to those who have chosen him for their oracle."—SIR N. TALFOURD: Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

"Jeffrey, who took the lead in this great revolution in literature, was a very remarkable man, but more so from the light, airy turn of his mind, and the facility of illustration which he possessed, than from either originality of thought or nervous force of expression. His information was far from extensive: he shared in the deficiency of his country at that period in classical knowledge; he was ignorant of Italian and German; and his acquaintance with French literature was chiefly confined to the gossiping memoirs of the day, and, with that of his own country, to the writings of the Scotch metaphysicians or the old English dramatists. But these subjects he knew thoroughly; within these limits he was thoroughly master. He was fitted by nature to be a great critic. A passionate admirer of poetry, alive to all the beauties and influences of nature, with a feeling mind and a sensitive heart, he possessed at the same time the calm judgment which enabled him to form an impartial opinion on the works submitted to his examination, and the correct taste which, in general, discovered genius and detected imperfections in them."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALBION: Hist. of Europe, 1815-52, chap. v. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia. We have already noticed this excellent work in our article on RICHARD ARNOLD, p. 69. Several years have elapsed since we penned that commendation, but the Comprehensive Commentary still stands without a rival for the purpose for which it is intended. Since writing the above, we were pleased to find the following weighty endorsement of our eulogy:

"This compilation exhibits a combination of all that is valuable in the deservedly-esteemed commentaries of Henry and Scott on the entire Bible, and of Doddridge on the New Testament. The notes are compiled from the various critics enumerated on the title-page; and, in general, the selection is made with judgment."—Borne's Bibl. Bib.

We must object, however, to the phrase "all that is valuable," &c. What is there in Henry, Scott, or Doddridge, entirely without value? Among Dr. J.'s other publications is, 2. Explan. Bible Atlas and Scripture Gazetteer, 1849, 4to.

"The author's remarks on the 'habit of observing' may be studied with profit by every young naturalist, as may also the style in which the observations are recorded. At the same time scientific and popular, the work cannot fail to please even the most careless general reader. Every page teems with interesting notes on the habits and manners of quadrupeds, birds, fishes, insects, &c.; many we would gladly quote, but must content ourselves with advising our readers to purchase the book itself, promising them a rich treat from the perusal."—Westminster Review, October, 1846.

Jenyns, Soame, M.P., 1793-64-1787, the son of Sir Roger Jenyns, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, was noted as a politician, an essayist, an insidel, and subsequently as a champion of Christianity. He was for nearly forty years Member of Parliament, for twenty-five years a Commissioner of the Board of Trade, and for a longer term than either of these a noted wit and conversationalist. The following is a list of his works: 1. Art of Dancing, a Poem, 1730. Anon. 2. Epistle to Lord Lovelace, 1735. 3. Poems, 1752; and with the Origin of Evil, 1761, 2 vols. 12mo. See No. 4. These poems originally appeared in Doddsley's Collection. They were added to the 2d and 3d edits. of Dr. Johnson's English Poets. 4. Free Inquiry into the Nature and Origin of Evil, 1757. With his Poems, 1761, 2 vols. 12mo. Ridiculed by Dr. Johnson in the Literary Gazette.

"Johnson's most exquisite critical essay in the Literary Magazine, and indeed anywhere, is his review of Soame Jenyns's Inquiry into the Origin of Evil."—Boswell's Life of Johnson, q. v.

And see The Idler, No. 89, Dec. 29, 1759. The Review was so much liked that Johnson republished it in a pamphlet. It has been styled on high authority the best of his writings: but who shall decide questions of this nature? A review of the Origin of Evil, and other works of its author, will be found in Green's Diary of a Lover of Literature. Of the first-named, Green remarks:

"Extremely ingenious and wretchedly unsatisfactory. . . . With all its paradoxical ingenuity, there appear to me only two truly original thoughts in this work."—Ipswich, 1810, p. 32.

5. Thoughts, &c. on the Present High Price of Provisions, 1767.

"A very flimsy publication."—McCulloch's Lit. of Publ. Econ., 1846, 193, q. v.

6. Miscellanies, 1770, 8vo. 7. View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion, 1776, 12mo; 10th ed., 1798, 8vo, and since. The last ed. is included in the vol. entitled Christian Evidences, pub. by H. G. Bohn, and edited by Rev. J. S. Memeo, LL.D., 1849, r. 8vo. (This valuable book should be in every library.) The examination of the Holy Scriptures dissipated Jenyns's infidelity, and his anxiety to save others from skepticism produced this and other theological essays. Jenyns's View excited much controversy, and was attacked by several of the clergy, who disapproved of some of its sentiments. Even the sincerity of the author was called in question, and he was charged with intending to injure Christianity, which he pretended to defend. But we have good evidence of Jenyns's honesty, and also of his piety. We quote some commendations of his View:

"A work of very considerable shrewdness and ingenuity, in which many striking views of Christianity are adduced in support of its heavenly origin."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"I confess myself to have been powerfully impressed by Mr. Jenyns's leading arguments in defence of Christianity."—Green's Diary, ubi supra.

"The work, brief and unassuming enough, nevertheless did religion more good service than many of much higher pretensions. The argument was of a popular kind: it derived force, too, as coming from one who was a layman and a wit."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

"The force of the argument addressed to the feelings of ingenious thinkers, and adapted to the reach of every understanding, is greater than mere scholars are willing to allow, and was never represented to so much advantage as in the beautiful little Treatise entitled A View of the Internal Evidence of Christianity."—Ms. MANUSCRIPTS, of Cambridge: Dissertations.

We next quote some opinions more qualified in their tone:

"The book is very ingenious: perhaps he brings rather too much ingenuity into his religion. I know, however, an instance in which this little work has converted a philosophical infidel, who had previously read all that had been written on the subject without effect."—HANNAH MORE.

What deplorable carelessness of expression is here! So far from this "philosophical" gentleman's having read "all that had been written on the subject," we will venture to say that he had never either read or heard of the one-tenth part that had been written on the subject. Nothing is more common than the observation, "This is the only book on the subject," or, "This is the best book on the subject." The first assertion may be said to be never true; and if the last is ever correct, say one in ten thousand instances, how is it to be proved? Let us avoid such childish extravagance of assertion. A man of true learning is rarely guilty of so great a fault.

"Dr. Mayo having asked Johnson's opinion of Soame Jenyns's View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion,—JOHNSON: 'I think it a pretty book; not very theological, indeed; and there seems to be an affectation of ease and carelessness, as if it were not suitable to his character to be very serious about the matter.'"
—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

"As a whole, it is admitted to be the best treatise, in its particular range, yet given to the world, but in some respects, differing according to the source whence the censure comes, the disapproval of its individual doctrines and reasonings is almost as universal."—Dr. MENZIES: Christian Evidences.

A list of the principal pamphlets elicited by Jenyns's View will be found in Chalmers's Biog. Dict., xviii. 520, n. 8. Disquisitions on Several Subjects, 1782, 8vo. See a review of this vol. in Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 226-227, and another in the London Retrospective Rev., Lon., 1820, ii. 291-304.

"We venture to assert that there are few books in the language of the same size [pp. 182] as the little volume before us containing more acute and ingenious reasoning, abounding in more lively illustration or more elegant and polished composition."—Retrop. Rev., ubi supra.

9. The Works of Soame Jenyns, 1790, 4 vols. 8vo; 1793, 4 vols. 8vo. Includes Pieces never before published, and biography of the author by Charles Nelson Cole. See Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 222-226; Orme's Bibl. Bib. 10. Tracts on the Holy Trinity, the Credo, &c. &c., 1814, 8vo. Jenyns also wrote some political essays. He perpetrated a satirical epitaph upon Dr. Johnson—shortly after the death of the latter—in which Boswell was remembered:

"Boswell and Thrale, retailers of his wit,
Will tell you how he wrote, and talk'd, and cough'd, and spit."

For this offence Boswell took terrible vengeance in an Epitaph on Jenyns. See Croker's Boswell's Johnson, Lon., 1848, p. 106. See also pp. 68, 392, 509, 590, 593; Life by Cole, prefixed to Jenyns's Works.

"His Poetry does not rise above mediocrity: indeed, it scarcely deserves the name: but the style of his prose is smooth and lucid, his turns of thought are neat and unexpected; and when he sports in irony, in which he apparently delights to indulge, he is uncommonly playful and airy. . . . Jenyns has evidently a predilection for paradoxical opinions: and why, he might reasonably urge in his defence, should a man address the Public, who has nothing new to offer to it?"—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 228.

As a political writer, Jenyns was the champion of principles which are now very generally disowned by Englishmen. He defended both the right and the expediency of taxing the American Colonies, (see his tract on American Taxation), and in his reflections on Parliamentary Reform he ridicules the idea of an independent Parliament. Professor Smyth, in speaking of the unavoidable influence of party predilections and the necessity of party co-operation, remarks:

"Read the works of Soame Jenyns and of Locke. Would not both of these men, for instance, while they retained their integrity, have been seen always on the opposite sides of any question that could affect the constitution and government of a free country?"—Lect. on Mod. Hist., Lect. 24.

Cumberland, in his Memoirs, gives us a graphic picture of Soame Jenyns, which is declared by Lord Jeffrey to be excellent, and a portion of which we had intended to quote; but, as our article has now grown to a length which forbids this, we must refer the reader to the Memoirs, or to Lord Jeffrey's review of that work in Edin. Rev. for April, 1806, and in his Contrib. to the Edin. Rev., Lon., 1853, 911-917.

Jerdan, William, b. 1782, for thirty-four years (1817-50) editor of the London Literary Gazette, is a native of Kelso, Roxburghshire, Scotland. Mr. Jerdan wrote the Biographical Memoirs for Fisher's National Portrait-Gallery of Illustrious and eminent Persons, has pub. some translations from the French, &c., and been connected with several journals. An account of his literary labours will be found in his Autobiography, Lon., 1852-53, 4 vols. p. 8vo. "We would recommend them to our readers, not only for their force and subtlety of thought, brilliancy of fancy, and exuberant eloquence of words, but for that spirit of love—that profound and glowing devotion—by which they are animated, and with which no one can come into sympathizing contact without feeling himself elevated and refined."—North British Review.

Jerrold, Douglas, 1803-1857, a native of Sheerness, in Kent, after being a midshipman in the Royal Navy, and subsequently a printer, had his fate decided for authorship by the success of the drama of Black-Eyed Susan, written before he was of age. This piece was followed by The Rent-Day, Nell Gwynne, The Bubbles of the Day, Time Works Wonders, The Catpaw, Retired from Business, Cupid, The Prisoner of War, The Heart of Gold, &c. As a contributor to Punch, and as editor of The Heads of the People, the Illustrated Magazine, the Shilling Magazine, and Lloyd's Weekly, Mr. Jerrold has won new laurels in another department of authorship. We append an alphabetical list of his productions, as pub. in vol. form. 1. Bubbles of the Day, a Comedy; 2d ed., 1845, 8vo. 2. Cakes and Ale, 1842, 2 vols. fp. 8vo; 1852, being vol. iv. of his Collected Works. 3. Chronicles of Clovernook, 1846, fp. 8vo; 1853, in vol. vi. of Collected Works. 4. A collective ed. of the works of this popular author was pub. in 8 vols. 12mo, 1851-54; reviewed in the Lon. Athenæum, 1854, 1293-1295. See also Men of the Time, Lon., 1856; N. York Eccl. Mag., xi. 443, with portrait. The Athenæum commends Mr. Jerrold's works in high terms:

"A perpetual of them serves to confirm our original opinion that their object is to advance the good of mankind; that to this object there has been a devotion of rare skill, undoubted originality, imperturbable good temper, concealed, perhaps, occasionally under apparent fierceness of phrase and a force and flash of wit at once dazzling and delightful. A body of works more original, either in the artistic construction or in the informing spirit, has not been added to the national literature of our time."—Lon. Athen., 1854, 1293: The Writings of Douglas Jerrold.

The Wit and Opinions of Douglas Jerrold, edited by William Blanchard Jerrold, and originally pub. in the London National Magazine, appeared in book-form in 1858; and the Life and Letters of Douglas Jerrold, edited by W. B. Jerrold, were announced same year. See also Douglas Jerrold's Portfolio of Well-Known Portraits, drawn by Kenny Meadows, with a Biographical and Critical Essay by E. L. "Jerrold was truly a man of a large heart, as well as of a great original genius. He never lost an opportunity of labouring in any act of benevolence that his sense of duty set before him; and his last words were those of affection towards all with whom he had been associated in friendship—to him a sacred relation."—Lon. Gent. Mag., ubi supra.

Jewel, Edward. The Stomach, &c., Lon., 1678, 4to.

Jewel, or Jewell, John, D.D., 1522-1571, a native of Devonshire, admitted of Merton College, Oxford, 1535, was in 1539 chosen scholar of Corpus Christi College, and subsequently became Reader of Humanity and Rhetoric in his college. In 1546 he professed himself a convert to the doctrines of the Reformation, and his zeal in disseminating his opinions led to his expulsion from his college. On the accession of Queen Mary in 1554, he fled to the Continent, and remained abroad until the year after Elizabeth ascended the throne; in 1560 he was consecrated Bishop of Salisbury, and in 1562 gave to the world, in elegant Latin, the most famous of his writings,—Apologia Ecclesie Anglicanæ. His unwearied labours in the discharge of the duties of his episcopate, and his unremitting devotion to study, brought on a state of physical exhaustion, which resulted fatally on the 22d of Sept. 1571, in the fiftieth year of his age. He was noted for his wonderful powers of memory, profound learning, and exemplary piety. A collective edition of his works, which consist principally of treatises in defence of the Church of England against Romanism, was pub. in 1609, fol.; 1611, fol.; 1631, fol.; 1711, fol. See edita. of separate publications in Watt's Bibl. Brit. There are two recent edita. of his collected works,—viz.: edited for the Parker Society by the Rev. John Ayre, Camb., 1845-50, 4 vols. sm. fol., £1 10s.; edited by R. W. Jelf, D.D., Oxf., 1847-48, 8 vols. 8vo, £3 12s. Of his Apology, and other pieces pub. separately, there have been many editions. His Challenge Sermon, preached at St. Paul's Cross, March 30, 1560, is considered one of the best specimens of his eloquence. See Life prefixed to the octavo edit. of the Apology, 1685; reprinted in Wordsworth's Eccles. Biog.; Barnet's Hist. of the Reformation; Holingshead's Chronicle; Biog. Brit.; Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon.; Fuller's Abel Redivivus; his Church History; Strype's Life of Cranmer; of Parker; Prince's Worthies of Devon; Chalmers's Biog. Diet.; Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 271, 598, 1037, 1038, 1039, 1269; C. W. Le Bas's Life of Jewell, 1835, 12mo. (Reviewed in British Critic, xviii. 38.) Jewell's Apology came out, Strype says, "to the abundant establishment of this reformed church upon antiquity."

"Jewell's Apology is an account of the grounds of our separation from the Church of Rome, as maintained after the separation had finally taken place. It was publicly received and allowed, and has also a claim to the attention of the reader, both for its clearness of argument and elegance of language."—BISHOP RANDOLPH: Enchiridion Theologicum.

"One of our best books."—BISHOP BURNET.

"Will especially reward perusal."—BICKERSTETH.

"This short book is written with spirit: the style is terse, the arguments pointed, the authorities much to the purpose; so that its effects are not surprising. This treatise is written in Latin; his Defence of the Apology, a much more diffuse work, in English. Upon the merits of the controversy of Jewell with the Jesuit Harding, which the defence embraces, I am not competent to give any opinion: in length and learning it far surpasses our earlier polemical literature."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, i. 561.

To the controversy with Harding we have already referred: see HARDING, THOMAS, and authorities there cited.

"The Church of England may be best studied in the writings of Jewell, as regards its separation from the Romanist."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

"For the answer to any question respecting the genuine sense of the documents of the Church of England, I consult no other authority."—CYRIL JACKSON, D.D., Dean of Christ Church.

"Jewell is eminent for his extensive learning, his sound views, and his Christian eloquence. All his works are valuable. . . . The finest Christian eloquence, deep learning, sound wisdom, and evangelical piety, mark the writings of this Reformer."—BICKERSTETH'S C.S.

"The contemporary of Archbishop Parker, Bishop Jewell, Bishop of Salisbury, with equal learning, united a more glowing style and richer eloquence. Jewell was indeed the most accomplished scholar who had yet appeared in the reformed Church of England."—Cutler's Literature of the Church of England.

"One of the greatest lights that the reformed Church of England hath produced."—WOOD: Athen. Oxon.

"Jewell's character cannot be too highly revered, or too respectfully spoken of."—DR. BLISS: ubi supra.

"The Jewel of Bishops, the worthiest Divine that Christendom hath bred for some hundred of years."—RICHARD HOOKER, author of the Ecclesiastical Polity.

"It may be said of his surname, nomen omne; Jewell his name and precious his virtues; so that, if the like ambition led us Englishmen, which doth foreigners, specially to render our surnames in Greek or Latin, he may be termed Johannes Gemma, on better account than Gemma Præiosa entitleth himself thereunto."—Fuller's Worthies of Devonshire.

Cicero beautifully calls the library "the Soul of the House." Professor Jewett, with a noble ambition, has zealously striven to provide such a soul for this great Republic, by his intelligent labours in connexion with the Smithsonian Institution, at Washington. We trust that he will yet see that magnificent temple adorned—not only with "goodly stones," (which sometimes preach any thing but profitable "sermons,") but—with the recorded learning of all ages, and the teachings of wisdom of every clime. A great National Library would be, indeed, a National Honour, a National Blessing, and a priceless boon, alike to the present generation, and to the countless millions who are to take our places, enter into our labours, and control the destinies of our country when we are no more!

Mr. Jewett was among the first to introduce the Common-School System into Ohio and Alabama.

Jewsbury, Miss Geraldine E., a native of Manchester, England, and a younger sister of the late Mrs. Fletcher, formerly Maria Jane Jewsbury, has given to the world a number of novels: 1. Zoe: the History of two Lives, Lon., 1845, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"We should imagine Miss Jewsbury better qualified to succeed in essays and speculative papers, than in descriptions of character as it is, or society as it has been."—Lon. Athen., 1845, 114.

"This novel made a sensation in its day, but its reputation was rather of an equivocal kind."—Lon. Times, 1856, where will be found a brief notice of Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 6.

2. The Half-Sisters, 1848, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 1854, 12mo.

"Displays, like its precursor, very considerable intellectual powers, a shrewd observance of character, and a general talent, or more strength than refinement, and, indeed, wanting only some polish to its roughness to raise it much higher in the intellectual scale."—*Lon. "A remarkably good novel; well written, amusing, sensible, and firm to its purpose."—Lon. Examiner.

Jewsbury, Maria Jane, 1800?-1833, a native of Warwickshire, but a resident of Manchester the principal part of her life, was married in 1833 to the Rev. William Fletcher, whom she accompanied, shortly after her marriage, on a religious mission to India. She fell a victim to cholera soon after her arrival at Bombay. Miss Jewsbury contributed many articles to the Lon. Athenaeum and other periodicals, which have never been collected. She pub. the following vols.: 1. Phantasmagoria; or, Sketches of Life and Literature. 2. Letters to the Young; 5th ed., 1843, fp. 8vo. 3. Lays of Leisure Hours. 4. Three Histories; new ed., 1844, fp. 8vo. The last-named work is a great favourite.

"Her enthusiasm was ardent, her piety steadfast, and her great talents would have enabled her to be eminently useful in the path to which she had been called. . . . In one quality—quickness in the motions of her mind—she was, in the author's estimation, unrivalled."—WORDSWORTH, the poet, an intimate friend of Miss Jewsbury.

"Miss Jewsbury the elder was one of our coadjutors in the long-past days of our struggle. . . . Quicker impulses, sounder conclusions, an imagination more fanciful, purposes more noble, or a more eager thirst after wisdom and goodness for their own sakes, have rarely distinguished any of the honourable and honoured line of authoresses. . . . There is no forgetting Miss Jewsbury whenever the gifted women of England are brought under notice."—Lon. Athenaeum, 1846, 114.

John of Beverley, the founder of the Abbey of Beverley, d. 721, is said by Bede to have written some Homilies and Epistles; but there is no work extant bearing his name. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Saxon Period, and authorities there cited.

John of Beverley, a Carmelite professor of divinity at Oxford about 1390, was the author of some questions on the Master of the Sentences, and some controversial pieces.

John of Brompton, Abbot of Jervaux, in Yorkshire, in 1193, is the reputed author of a Chronicle of English History, 588-1198; but it is very doubtful whether it is properly ascribed to him. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, and authorities there cited.

John of Cornwall, flourished 1170, was the author of three theological treatises, the principal one of which—relating to the humanity of Christ—is known by the title of Eulogium, and was given to the world about 1160 or '70. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, and authorities there cited.

John de Hauteville, flourished 1184, was the author of a poem entitled Arohitrenius, and is supposed, without probability, to have written some other poetical pieces. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, and authorities there cited.

John of Salisbury, 1120?-1180, a native of Salisbury, studied at Oxford and Paris, opened a school in the latter place, subsequently lived in England as secretary to Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, and to his successor, Thomas à Becket, and, in 1176, was made Bishop of Chartres by the recommendation of Louis of France. His prinincipal works are his Polyeraticus de nugis curialium et vestigiis philosophorum; a metrical treatise entitled Entheticeus de dogmate philosophorum; the Metalogicus; his epistles, and a life of Thomas à Becket.

"As a writer, John of Salisbury is estimable for his great erudition, and for the general correctness of his style."—Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, q. v. for a notice of this writer and editions of his works.

Since the publication of Mr. Wright's invaluable work, a new edition—and the best—has appeared,—viz.: Opera Omnia, nunc primum in unum collegit, et cum codicibus manuscriptorum contulit J. A. Giles, Oxon., 1848, 5 vols. 8vo.

Johnson, Samuel, 1649–1703, a native of Warwickshire, educated at Trinity Coll., Cambridge, Rector of Coringham, Essex, 1670, and subsequently chaplain to Lord William Russell, distinguished himself by his courageous opposition to the despotism of James II. and this monarch's efforts to extend Popery in Great Britain. He pub. several controversial treatises and sermons, of which a collective ed., with his life, was pub. in 1710, fol.; in 1713, fol.; and again in 1737, fol. In 1682, he pub. Julian the Apostate, intended to disprove the doctrine of passive obedience to the government. This work was (as we have already seen, p. 841 of this Dictionary) answered by Dr. George Hickes, in his Jovian, 1673, 8vo. But it was more effectually answered by the powers that be, for the zealous partisan was sentenced to pay a fine of 500 marks, and was thrown into prison until he should discharge it. Nothing daunted by this, Johnson again took up his pen, and in 1686, at the instigation of Hugh Speke, a fellow-prisoner, drew up an Address to the Protestants in the King's Army, (then encamped on Hounslow Heath,) urging them not to obey illegally-commissioned officers.

"For both these publications, his spirit was, doubtless, deserving of the highest applause."—Sir JAMES MACKINTOSH: Review of the Causes of the Revolution of 1688.

The government thought otherwise: "Julian Johnson" (for so he was now called) was sentenced to stand thrice on the pillory, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. This barbarous sentence was carried into execution, and three hundred and seventeen stripes failed to make the patriot wince. After the Revolution, he was compensated by King William for his sufferings. At least he received a present of £1000, a pension of £300 a year for two lives, and his son was taken into the public service.

"His morals were pure, his religious feelings ardent, his learning and abilities not contemptible, his judgment weak, his temper stormy, turbulent, and unconquerably stubborn."—T.B. MACAULAY: Hist. of England, vol. i.

John Dryden, whose impure muse and time-serving spirit could neither understand nor respect a man of Johnson's purity and dauntless courage, disgraced himself by endeavouring to ridicule "Ben Jochanan," as he called the author of Julian, but we have ample testimonies of the excellence of the latter:

"I never knew a man of better sense, of a more innocent life, or of greater virtue, than Mr. Samuel Johnson."—John Hampden to the Duchess of Mazarine.

The works of Johnson are by no means to be despised, even in our day.

"A very remarkable writer. I do not know where I could put my hand upon a book containing so much sense and sound constitutional doctrine as this thin folio of Johnson's."—S. T. COLERIDGE.

Johnson, Samuel, D.D., 1696–1772, a native of Guilford, Conn., grad. at Yale College, 1714; minister of West Haven, 1720; received Episcopal ordination in England, 1723, and in November of the same year settled at Stratford, Connecticut, as a missionary; President (the first) of King's College, New York, 1755 to '63, when he returned to his old charge at Stratford. He pub. several controversial tracts in favour of Episcopacy, 1733, &c.; a System of Morality, 1746; a Compendium of Logic, 1752; a Sermon, an English Grammar, and a Catechism, 1765; a Hebrew Grammar, 1767; and some theolog. treatises. See his Life, by Rev. Dr. Thos. B. Chandler, 1805; again, Lon., 1824, 8vo.

Johnson, Samuel, LL.D., Sept. 18, 1709–Dec. 13, 1784, one of the most distinguished writers of any age or country, was a native of Lichfield, where his father carried on the business of a bookseller with more respectability than profit. After a course of preparatory instruction in Mr. Hunter's academy in his native town, and at Mr. Westworth's school at Stourbridge, he was in his nineteenth year (1728) entered of Pembroke College, Oxford, where he remained for three years, returning home without a degree in 1731. In 1732, he became usher to a school in Market-Bosworth, but found this appointment so distasteful that in a few months he threw it up, and removed to Birmingham, where he found partial employment as contributor to a newspaper published by a Mr. Warren, a bookseller of that place. It was for this gentleman that he composed his first published work—an abridged translation into English from the French of Father Lobo's Voyage into Abyssinia. His reward for this performance was the inconsiderable sum of five guineas. In 1736, he was married to Mrs. Porter, the widow of a Lichfield trader,—a lady of vulgar manners, loud voice, florid complexion, and nearly double his age, and with eight hundred pounds sterling in the funds. The newly-married pair thought that this small fortune could not be better employed than in the fitting up of an academy at Edial, near Lichfield; and accordingly the public was soon advised of the opening of an institution which, fortunately for the cause of letters, was destined soon to be closed. Three pupils only—David Garrick and his brother being two—"thronged the doors" of this respectable seminary. Disgusted with the indifference or incredulity of his townsmen, the dominie determined to try a better market for his talents and learning, and in 1737, accompanied by one of his pupils,—he who in after-years so long trod the stage without a peer,—he took the highroad for London, and from that day became an author by profession. Three years before this period—that is, in 1734—he had unsuccessfully sought an engagement as contributor to The Gentleman's Magazine; but he was now more fortunate in his efforts, and from March, 1738, to 1754, was a regular coadjutor to honest Edward Cave, in whose life in this Dictionary we have already referred to this profitable connexion. At times, indeed, the poor scholar was reduced so low in his finances as to be obliged to live upon fourpence halfpenny per day, and then roam the streets at night with Savage, or some other brother in misfortune, for want of a lodging.

In 1738, Johnson was employed upon a translation of Father Paul Sarpi's History of the Council of Trent, which was discontinued by Dodsley and Cave in consequence of a rival translation by another Samuel Johnson. It was in May of this year, 1738, that our author gave to the world London, a Poem, in imitation of the Third Satire of Juvenal; a production which was so immediately successful, that, to quote the quaint language of a critic in the Gentleman's Magazine, it became "remarkable for having got to the second edition in the space of a week." It so happened that London appeared in the same day with Pope's Satire of 1738, and the youthful author had no reason to regret the coincidence, for people said, "Here is an unknown poet greater even than Pope."

Pope set young Richardson to work to find out who this formidable rival was. Richardson reported that he had discovered only that "his name was Johnson, and that he was some obscure man." "He will soon be déterré," replied Pope. This was not the only instance in which he displayed a commendable generosity to the rising star, for from the perusal of London alone he recommended him to Earl Gower when Johnson (in the next year) sought a degree "to qualify him for the mastership of a charity-school."

Of this and of some later portions of Johnson's life we find some notices contributed by ourselves some years since to Putnam's Magazine, (New York, April, 1864,) and from these memoranda we shall not hesitate to quote when it suits our purpose.

The similarity between London and Pope's satirical vein is very observable. The Vanity of Human Wishes essays a more dignified strain. Garrick accounts for this in his own facetious manner:

"When Johnson lived much with the Harveys, and saw a good deal of what was passing in life, he wrote his London, which is lively and easy; when he became more retired, he gave us his Vanity of Human Wishes, which is as hard as Greek: had he gone on to imitate another satire, it would have been as hard as Hebrew."

And yet, flippant little David, thy old schoolmaster wrote a hundred lines a day of this poem, if it is all Greek to thee. Hard as it was to thee, it softened a greater man to tears, for Walter Scott tells us,

"The deep and pathetic morality of The Vanity of Human Wishes has often extracted tears from those whose eyes wander dry over pages professedly sentimental."

Ay, it drew tears from the eyes of the author himself! George Lewis Scott describes a very interesting little family-gathering at Thrale's, when Dr. Johnson read aloud his satire: whilst recounting the difficulties of the poor, struggling scholar, he "burst into a passion of tears." Poor fellow! he remembered those days when he subscribed himself impræsumus. No longer subject to the pangs of hunger, he now had all that heart could wish,—plenty, "honour, love, obedience, troops of friends;" but his mind reverted to those bitter days of penury when he wandered in the streets for want of a lodging, and, in the garb of poverty, devoured his dinner, furnished by the hand of charity, behind the curtain at good Mr. Cave's! How had his condition changed! We need not marvel at those outpourings of a grateful heart which gush forth in his quiet hours of meditation and solemn seasons of prayer. The great Being on whose guidance and protection he had confidently relied in the day of destitution and hour of trial had not disappointed his hopes. He had "brought him to great honour, and comforted him on every side." This he deeply felt, and, however at times arrogant and harsh to his fellow-men, he ever, as Bishop Horne well says, "walked humbly before the Lord his God."

Johnson had no little difficulty in finding a publisher for London, but at last Dodsley ventured to purchase it for the magnificent sum of ten guineas! The author speaks of this as no inconsiderable price for it:

"I might, perhaps," he says, "have accepted of less, but that Paul Whitehead had a little before got ten guineas for a poem, and I would not take less than Paul Whitehead."

In 1744, the reputation of the young author was greatly increased by the publication of the Life of Richard Savage, and this admirable biography was followed in 1746 by a Plan of the Dictionary of the English Language; in 1749, by the representation of the tragedy of Irene, and the publication of The Vanity of Human Wishes; and in 1750-52, by the issue of the Rambler. The Dictionary was given to the world in 1755; the Idler dates from April 5, 1758, to April 5, 1760; Rasselas was pub. in 1759; the edition of Shakspeare, with Notes, in 1765; The False Alarm in 1770; Thoughts on the late Transactions respecting Falkland Islands, 1771; A Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland, and The Patriot, in 1774; Taxation no Tyranny, in 1775; and the Lives of the English Poets, his last production of any importance, (and which he had commenced in 1777,) in 1779-81. The Poets in this collection commence with Cowley, and, with the exception of Blackmore, Watts, Pomfret, and Yalden, were chosen by the booksellers, whose original design went no further than the preparation of Biographical Prefaces to the selection of British poetry which they were about giving to the world. This meagre project was happily enlarged by the skill and taste of the editor. The lives of Savage, Cowley, Milton, Gray, Dryden, and Pope, are considered the best in point of literary workmanship. The ed. of The Poets to which they were originally prefixed, 1779-81, was in 60 vols. sm. 8vo. price, £7 10s. A 2d ed. was pub. in 1790, in 75 vols. 12mo.

A chronological and detailed list of Johnson's writings—which we think it unnecessary to quote in this place—will be found in the Appendix to Boswell's Life of Johnson,—a work which has made the life of the great lexicographer so familiar to general readers, that some brevity on our part may well be excused. In 1762, a pension of £300, conferred by George III., placed the author of the Rambler in circumstances of comparative affluence, and enabled him to pass his remaining days without being subjected to that harassing literary drudgery for which few men were so ill qualified, and still fewer would have so bravely endured. We must not forget to mention, before leaving this division of our subject, that in 1755 Johnson received the degree of M.A. from the University of Oxford; the title of Doctor of Laws from Trinity College, Dublin, in 1762; and the same compliment from Oxford in 1775.

The only complete edition of Johnson's Works is that pub. at Oxford, by Talboys and Wm. Pickering, in 1825, in 11 vols. 8vo.—The Oxford Classic Edition. The contents are as follows: Vol. I. Life; Poems; Rasselas; Lectures; II., III. Rambler; IV. Adventurer; Idler; V. Miscellaneous Pieces; VI. Reviews; Political Tracts; Lives of Eminent Persons; VII. Lives of the Poets: Cowley, Denham, Milton, Butler, Rochester, Roscommon, Otway, Waller, Pomfret, Dorset, Stepney, J. Philips, Walsh, Dryden, Smith, Duke, King, Sprat, Halifax, Parnell, Garth, Rowe, Addison, Hughes, and Sheffield; VIII. Lives of the Poets: Prior, Congreve, Blackmore, Fenton, Gay, Granville, Yalden, Tickell, Hammond, Somerville, Savage, Swift, Broome, Pope, Pitt, Thomson, Wattle, A. Philips, West, Collins, Dyer, Shenstone, Young, Mallet, Akenside, Gray, and Lyttelton; IX. Journey to the Hebrides; Vision of Theodoric; The Fountains, a Fairy Tale; Prayers and Meditations; Sermons; Index to vols. I.-ix.; X., XI. Parliamentary Debates, 1740-43.

We are now to consider the distinguished subject of our notice: 1, as a Poet; 2, as an Essayist; 3, as a Lexicographer; 4, as a Critic. We shall also briefly review—5, the peculiarities of his style; 6, his appearance, manners, and conversation; 7, his moral and religious character.

1. DR. JOHNSON AS A POET.

"Read Johnson's Vanity of Human Wishes,—all the examples and mode of giving them sublime, as well as the latter part, with the exception of an occasional couplet. I do not much admire the opening. I remember an observation of Sharpe's, (the Observationist, as he was called in London, and a very clever man,) that the first line of his poem was superfluous, and that Pope (the very best of poets, I think) would have begun at once, only changing the punctuation,—

"Survey mankind from China to Peru."

"The former line, 'Let observation,' &c. is certainly heavy and useless. But 'tis a grand poem—and so true! true as the teeth of Juvenal himself. The lapse of ages changes all things,—time—language—the earth—the bounds of the sea—the stars of the sky, and every thing 'about, around, and underneath' man, except man himself, who has always been, and always will be, an unlucky rascal. The infinite variety of lives conducts but to death, and the infinity of wishes leads but to disappointment."—LORD BRONX: Ravenna Diary, Jan. 9, 1821.

James Ballantyne remarks of Sir Walter Scott,—a comment of whose upon the pathos of The Vanity of Human Wishes we have already quoted:

"He had often said to me, that neither his own nor any modern popular style of composition was that from which he derived most pleasure. I asked him what it was. He answered, Johnson's; and that he had more pleasure in reading London, and the Vanity of Human Wishes, than any other poetical composition he could mention; and I think I never saw his countenance more indicative of high admiration, than while reciting aloud from these productions."—Lockhart's Scott.

Lockhart tells us that the last line of MS. that Scott sent to the press was a quotation from The Vanity of Human Wishes.

"Yet," continues Lockhart, "it is the cant of our day—above all, of its poetasters—that Johnson was no poet. To be sure, they say the same of Pope,—and hint it occasionally even of Dryden."

"Juvenal has been translated by Dryden: but the mere English reader will derive the best conception of the manner of this noble satirist from the admirable imitations of Dr. Johnson, which are beyond all praise. Mr. Murphy and Mr. Lewis have likewise lately published imitations of this poet, which possess much merit, though certainly far inferior to the spirited productions of Johnson."—DR. DRAKE.

"Perused Johnson's London and Vanity of Human Wishes. His numbers are strong in sense, and smooth in flow, but want that varied grace and inextinguishable spirit which constitute the essential charm of Pope's."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lich, Ipswich, 1810, 66.

"Dr. Johnson's London, a Satire, is a noble poem. But his great moral genius was constrained in composition by the perpetual parody on his powerful prototype, Juvenal. To have shown so much genius and so much ingenuity at one and the same time, to have been so original even in imitation, places him in the highest order of minds. But his range was here circumscribed; for he had to move parallel with the Roman,—finding out in every passage corresponding and kindred sins,—and in order to preserve—which he did wondrously—the similitude—

"To bridle in his struggling muse with pain,

Which long'd to launch into a nobler strain."

Professor Wilson: Blackw. Mag., June, 1828; and his Essays Critical and Imaginative, Edin. and Lon., 1866, i. 230.

"That his tragedy [Irene] was a great failure on the stage has been already related; that it is of extreme dulness, of a monotony altogether insufferable, and therefore tires out the reader's patience quite as much as it did the auditor's, is true; that most of his lesser pieces are only things of easy and of fairly-successful execution is likewise certain, with perhaps the exception of his verses on Robert Levet's death, which have a sweetness and tenderness seldom found in any of his compositions. But, had he never written anything after the Imitations of Juvenal, his name would have gone down to posterity as a poet of great excellence—one who only did not reach equal celebrity with Pope, because he came after him, and did not assiduously court the muse.

"In truth, these two pieces are admirable, both for their matter, their diction, and their verification. . . . Of Johnson's Latin verses it remains to speak, and they assuredly do not rise to the level of his English, nor indeed above mediocrity. The translation of Pope's Messiah, however, a work of his boyhood, gave a promise not fulfilled in his riper years."—Lord Brougham: Lives of Men of Letters of the Time of George III.

2. DR. JOHNSON AS AN ESSAYIST.

Under the head of essays, we may, without much violence to strict classification, add Johnson's political pamphlets, his Parliamentary Debates, and his tale of Rasselas, to the periodical papers of the Rambler, the Idler, &c. The first number of the Rambler was pub. on Tuesday, March 20, 1749–50, and the last on Saturday the 17th (14th, in fact) March, 1752, 208 numbers in all, issued every Tuesday and Saturday, without the loss of a single publication-day. Would that all authors who seek to advance the interests of religion and morality were as conscientious as the author of The Rambler, in imploring the aid of divine grace, "without which nothing is strong, nothing is holy." "Grant, I beseech thee," supplicates the pious writer, "that in this undertaking thy Holy Spirit may not be withheld from me, but that I may promote thy glory, and the salvation of myself and others." The Rambler excited but little attention at first. Croker seems to question Payne's assertion to Chalmers, that Richardson's essay, No. 97, was the "only paper which had a prosperous sale and was popular." But the ladies will side with Payne, when they discover by inspection what "No. 97" is about. We shall not inform them, and indeed we strictly forbid any of our female readers to turn to this mysterious paper. If in this Blue-Beard prohibition we meet with the same measure of obedience which was accorded to the gentleman just named, we ought not to be surprised. The good Doctor was sorely put to it to find a name for his child. He told Sir Joshua Reynolds,

"What must be done, sir, will be done. When I began publishing that paper I was at a loss how to name it. I sat down at night upon my bedside, and resolved that I would not go to sleep till I had fixed its title. The Rambler seemed the best that occurred, and I took it."

The Doctor wrote the whole of the 208 papers, with the exception of four billets in No. 10, by Miss Mulso, (afterwards Mrs. Chapone;) No. 30, by Mrs. Catherine Talbot; No. 97, by Richardson; and Nos. 44 and 100, by Elizabeth Carter. Of Johnson's 204, thirty only were "worked up" from previously-prepared materials. After a time, the Rambler gained the public ear; and, this secured, the public voice soon followed. Cave, the publisher of the paper, received a number of commendatory letters, newspaper-versions appeared in its praise, and James Elphinstone (see p. 555 of this Dictionary) superintended an Edinburgh edition, which followed the London issue. Richardson wrote to Cave that Johnson was the only man who could write them; which Cave admitted, but complained that, good as they were, they were very slow sale. Even corpulent Mrs. Rambler, who had never been suspected of very exquisite literary sensibilities, was moved by these effusions of the "gude man's," and rewarded his labours with the very handsome speech,—"I thought very well of you before, but I did not imagine you could have written any thing equal to this."

Notwithstanding the tardy sale at first, the author had the satisfaction of surviving ten editions in London alone. We must not conceal the fact that some unreasonable beings complained of the erudite dignity of the style, and declared that the author (a true "Yankee trick" it would now be called) used the hard words in the Rambler in order to render his Dictionary—of which the Prospectus had been issued a short time before—indispensably necessary.

Edmund Burke, who, like most truly great men, excelled in wit and humour, said that Johnson's ladies—his Miscellans, Lorimas, Properantias, and Rhodocelas—were all "Johnson's in petticoats." This is much of a piece with Goldsmith's telling Johnson that if he were to compose a work in which little fishes had to converse, he would make them all talk like great whales!

In his contributions to the Adventurer, the Doctor uses the stilts less; he walks more,—perhaps occasionally runs.

Yet majestic diction was as natural to a man who thought in rounded periods as was a disjointed chaos of the parts of speech to many of his critics. So far from the elaborate verbal architecture, anxiously built up and painfully cemented, which the reader supposed, the Ramblers were written just as they were wanted for the press; indeed, at times the first half was in type before the remainder was on paper.

Boswell relates an amusing anecdote relative to the Italian edition of the Rambler:

"A foreign minister, of no very high talents, who had been in the company for a considerable time, quite overlooked, happened luckily to mention that he had read some of his Rambler in Italian, and admired it much. This pleased him [Johnson] greatly. He observed that the title had been translated Il Genio Errante, though I have been told it was rendered, more ludicrously, Il Vagabondo; and, finding that this minister gave such a proof of his taste, he was all attention to him, and on the first remark which he made, however simple, exclaimed, 'The ambassador says well; his Excellency observes;' and then he expanded and enriched the little that had been said in so strong a manner that it appeared something of consequence. This was exceedingly entertaining to the company who were present, and many a time afterwards it furnished a pleasant topic of merriment. 'The ambassador says well' became a laughable term of applause when no weighty matter had been expressed."

It deserves to be noticed that the 110th number of the Rambler (on Repentance) was the means of deciding the Rev. James Compton, of the English Benedictine Monks at Paris, to leave that body and embrace the Protestant faith. How many devotees of the Greek Church it would have converted we have, unfortunately, no means of knowing. Yet the author thought at one time that it was about having the opportunity presented to it. Somehow or other he heard that the Empress of Russia had ordered a translation of the Rambler into the Russian language:

"So," says the author, with a complacent smile, "I shall be read on the banks of the Wolga. Horace boasts that his fame would extend as far as the banks of the Rhone; now, the Wolga is farther from me than the Rhone from Horace."

Whether this was the work of some wicked wag, or not, we cannot tell; but we believe that the Russian edition of the Rambler is even scarcer than any "liber rarissimus" which tantalises the "helluo librorum" in the "choice catalogues of Thomas Thorpe."

We have seen how greatly the Rambler was admired in the select circles which gave law to the Republic of Letters of that day. The Doctor fully endorsed all that was said in praise of his essays, and observed, not without truth, of his Rambler, that he "had laboured to refine our language to grammatical purity, and to clear it from colloquial barbarisms, licentious idioms, and irregular combinations, and that he has added to the elegance of its construction and the harmony of its cadence."

But it is not to be supposed that the voice of admiration was the only one to be heard:

"The Rambler," remarks a celebrated literary and fashionable lady of the day, "is certainly a strange misnomer: he always plods in the beaten road of his predecessors, following the Spectator (with the same pace as a packhorse would do a hunter) in the style that is proper to lengthen a paper. These writers may, perhaps, be of service to the public, which is saying a great deal in their favour. There are numbers of both sexes who never read any thing but such productions, and cannot spare time from doing nothing to go through a sixpenny pamphlet. Such gentle readers may be improved by a moral hint which, though repeated over and over from generation to generation, they never heard in their lives. I should be glad to know the name of this laborious author."—LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU: Works, Lond., 1803, 5 vols. 8vo; vol. iv. p. 250.

"As an essayist, he merits more consideration, [than as a poet and dramatist.] His Ramblers are in everybody's hands. About them opinions vary, and I rather believe the style of these essays is not now considered as a good model. This he corrected in his more advanced age, as may be seen in his Lives of the Poets, where his diction, though occasionally elaborate and highly metaphorical, is not nearly so inflated and ponderous as in the Ramblers."—Memoirs of Rich and Cumberland: Samuel Johnson.

"His Ramblers are in every body's hands," says Cumberland; but his Memoirs were pub. in 1806, and now, in 1856,—half a century later,—this can no longer be said;—nor, indeed, could it have been truly said, for many years past,

"Where is the man who, having turned his thirtieth year, peruses Rasselas or the Rambler?"—Debbin's Loh. Comp., ed. 1826, 617–618.

"Nobody now reads the Rambler or the Idler, and the colossal reputation of Johnson rests almost entirely upon his profound and caustic sayings recorded in Boswell."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALLISON: Essays, Polit. Histor. and Miscell., Edin. and Lon., 1850, ii. 421.

But Sir Archibald certainly speaks in haste: the Rambler and Idler are still read, and will always be read, and that to the great profit of the readers. We should not omit to notice, in passing, that Sir Archibald pays a high compliment to the essays of Johnson. See Hist. of Europe, 1850-52, chap. v.

In the whole course of our "Johnsonian readings" we have met with nothing upon this subject which pleased us better, as a lucid exposition of the truth upon this subject, than the following remarks of a learned American divine,—one of the most profound thinkers, and certainly one of the best writers, of the age:

"It has been asked, with emphasis, 'Who now reads the Rambler?' And it is indubitable that this book, which once exerted so mighty an influence on the English language and people, has given place, at least in general reading, to works of far inferior merit and interest. The reason seems to be, that its object is wellnigh accomplished. It commenced with a standard of morals and language elevated far above the prevailing style of morals and of writing. It has elevated both, and has brought the English language and notions of morality to its own level. Nor is it wonderful that men should regard with less interest a work which now is seen to have no very extraordinary elevation. It is a component part of English literature, having fixed itself in the language, the style, and the morals of the English people, and taken its place as an integral, almost undistinguished, part of the national principles of writing and morality. The result is that, while the benefits of the Rambler may be diffusing themselves, unperceived, to almost all the endowments of the freinds and virtues of the community, the book itself may be very imperfectly known and unfrequently perused. Johnson may be almost forgotten, except in praise; but his mighty power is yet seedling forth a mild influence over lands and seas, like the gentle movements of the dew and the sunbeam."—REV. ALBERT BARNES: Christian Spectator, 1852; and in his Miscell. Essays and Reviews, N. York, 1855, I, 126.

To the same effect writes Sir James Mackintosh:

"Some heaviness and weariness must be felt by most readers at the perusal of essays on life and manners, written like the Rambler; but, it ought never to be forgotten that the two most popular writers of the eighteenth century, Addison and Johnson, were such efficacious teachers of virtue that their writings may be numbered among the causes which in an important degree have contributed to preserve and to improve the morality of the British nation."—Mackintosh's Life, Lon., 1836, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The publication of the Rambler, though not very successful during its progress, stamped the character of the author as one of the first moral writers of the age, and as eminently qualified to write, and even to improve, the English language."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Life of Samuel Johnson, Miscell. Prose Works, Abbotford ed., Edin. and Lon., 1850, III, 206.

"It would not be easy to name a book more tiresome—indeed, more difficult—to read, or one which gives moral lessons in a more frigid tone, with less that is lively or novel in the matter, in a language more heavy and monotonous. The measured pace, the constant balance of the style, becomes quite intolerable, for there is no interesting truth to be inculcated remote from common observation, nor is there any attack carried on against difficult positions, nor any satirical warfare maintained either with opinions or with persons."—LORD BROUGHAM: Lives of Men of Letters of the Time of George III, Lon. and Glasg., 1855, 347.

Mr. Hazlitt is, if possible, still more severe in his strictures on the Rambler. We can quote but a few lines of his critique:

"After closing the volumes of the Rambler, there is nothing that we remember as a new truth gained to the mind,—nothing indelibly stamped upon the memory; nor is there any passage that we wish to turn to, as embodying any known principle or observation with such force and beauty that justice can only be done to the idea in the author's own words."—On the Periodical Essayists.

We cannot resist the temptation of quoting, by way of contrast to the above, a line or two from the enthusiastic commendation of the author of Clarissa:

"I am inexpressibly pleased with them. . . . I hope the world tastes them; for its own sake I hope the world tastes them. . . . I would not, for any consideration, that they should be laid down through discouragement."—Samuel Richardson to Owen, Aug. 9, 1750.

Perhaps Rasselas, which is quite as much of an essay, or, rather, series of essays, as it is a novel, is even still more neglected than the Rambler. The fervid eulogy of Johnson's greatest biographer is well known, but we must find room for it in our pages:

"This tale, with all the charms of Oriental imagery, and all the force and beauty of which the English language is capable, leads us through the most important scenes of human life, and shows us that this stage of our being is full of 'vanity and vexation of spirit.' The fund of thinking which this work contains is such that almost every sentence of it may furnish a subject of long meditation. I am not satisfied if a year passes without my having read it through; and at every perusal my admiration of the mind which produced it is so highly raised that I can scarcely believe I had the honour of enjoying the intimacy of such a man."—BOWELL.

We give some other opinions upon this once-celebrated production. Hazlitt is less enthusiastic:

"Rasselas is the most melancholy and debilitating moral speculation that ever was put forth."—On the Periodical Essayists.

Dr. Young, on the contrary, calls Rasselas "a mass of sense."

"The work can scarce be termed a narrative, being in a great measure void of incident: it is rather a set of moral dialogues on the various vicissitudes of human life, its follies, its fears, its hopes, its wishes, and the disappointment in which all terminate. The style is in Johnson's best manner, enriched and rendered sonorous by the trade and quaternions which he so much loved, and balanced with an art which, perhaps, he derived from the learned Sir Thomas Browne."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Life of Johnson.

"In his Rasselas we have much to admire, and enough to make us wish for more. It is the work of an illuminated mind, and offers many wise and deep reflections, clothed in beautiful and harmonious diction. We are not, indeed, familiar with such personages as Johnson has imagined for the characters of his fable; but, if we are not exceedingly interested in their story, we are infinitely gratified with their conversation and remarks."—Cumberland's Memoirs: Samuel Johnson.

"No prig shall ever persuade me that Rasselas is not a noble performance in design and in execution. Never were the expenses of a mother's funeral more gloriously defrayed by a son than the funeral of Samuel Johnson's mother by the price of Rasselas, written for the pious purpose of laying her head decently and honourably in the dust."—CHRISTOPHER NORTH: Notes Ambrosianae, April, 1629.

The admirer of Johnson will be grateful to us for extending our quotations from Professor Wilson. Always eloquent, the enthusiastic Christopher strikes even a higher chord than is his wont when the author of the Rambler becomes his glowing theme:

"He had noble faculties and noble feelings; a hate, high as heaven, of wickedness; a scorn, as high, of all that was base or mean; wide knowledge of the world, of London, of life; severe judgment; imagination not very various perhaps, but very vivid, and, when conjoined with such an intellect, even wonder-working, in realms that seemed scarcely of right to belong to the solemn sage. Witness the Happy Valley of Rasselas, and, indeed, all that as yet unsurpassed story, where, on the wings of fancy and feeling, you are wafted along over the earth, yet never lose sight of its flesh-and-blood inhabitants, working and weeping, yet not unhappy, still, in their toils and their tears, and dying but to live again, in no cold, glittering, poetic heaven, but in the shades of bliss, seen by the eyes of nature through religion, bailed in the skies."—The Men of Two, a Satire; in Blackw. Mag., June, 1828; and in Wilson's Essays, Critical and Imaginative, Edin. and Lon., 1856, I, 231.

"The reader who first attempts the Abyssinian Candide feels that he has imposed on himself a task rather than found a pleasure, or even a relaxation. The manner is heavy and little suited to the occasion; the matter is of a very ordinary fabric, if it is safe and wholesome; there is nothing that shines except the author's facility of writing in a very artificial style, as soon as we are informed, by external evidence, of the whole having been written in a few nights. He, perhaps, had some kind of misgiving that it was not a successful effort, for he had never looked at it till two-and-twenty years after it was written, when, a friend happening to have it, who was travelling with him, Johnson read it with some eagerness."—LORD BROUGHAM: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

The noble critic just quoted considers Johnson's political pamphlets and his occasional tracts as far superior to his moral essays; and he especially commends Taxation no Tyranny, and the review of Soame Jenyns's Treatise on the Origin of Evil. The last-named production has already come under our notice in our life of Soame Jenyns. The eloquence of the Parliamentary Debates was of so high an order that Dr. Francis declared that of Demosthenes to be inferior; and Voltaire did not scruple to affirm that the Greek and Roman orators had revived in the British Senate.

3. DR. JOHNSON AS A LEXICOGRAPHER.

Before the appearance of Johnson's great work (in 1755) the English were sadly in want of a good lexicon of their language. The one in use—not without considerable merit—was that of Nathan Bailey, which we have already noticed in our life of that industrious philologist. English scholars, therefore, had to endure in silence the sarcasm of the Abbé le Blanc, who declared that such was the passion for the English tongue that the French had made it one of the learned languages, and that even their women studied it, and yet that there was not so much as a good dictionary, or, rather, a tolerable grammar. We shall not be expected, in the limited space to which we are confined, to enter into any consideration of the philological dispute of the day respecting the comparative merits of the dictionaries of Johnson, Webster, Richardson, and others. Like the valet de chambre in the Vicar of Wakefield who read so many magazines, though they quarrel among each other we dearly love them all, and keep the most important of them by our elbow. As regards orthography, we certainly do not—as every page of this volume testifies—follow the example of our countryman, whilst we should undoubtedly feel entitled to ridicule without mercy the stolidity of the tyro who should undertake to compare the meagre philological attainments of Dr. Johnson with the amazing erudition, in this department, of Dr. Noah Webster.

We had intended to quote some criticisms of Drs. Webster and Richardson on the execution of Johnson's Dictionary; but, as such quotations would involve the necessity of an impartial presentation of both sides of the question,—for which presentation we lack both space and time,—we shall content ourselves, and, we trust, our readers, with the citation of a few opinions, which (with, perhaps, the exception of Lord Brougham's) are not to be considered as instituting any comparison between Johnson's Dictionary and the two which have only recently, in their perfected shape, been submitted to the public eye.

The Doctor, with his usual foresight, had adopted an excellent mode of discouraging all adverse criticism, by admitting in his admirable preface that "a few wild blunders and risible absurdities might for a time furnish folly with laughter and harden ignorance into contempt." Now, as no reviewer is particularly desirous of being considered either a fool or an ignoramus, we may well suppose that the Jeffreys of the day were contented to praise where they could and to be silent where they disapproved. We may remark, in this connexion, that it seems hardly worth while for us to repeat the old and well-known story of Johnson's impertinent and unjust letter to the Earl of Chesterfield. It is not to be forgotten, however, that the Earl's suggestions upon the prospectus were all adopted by the author.

The Monthly Review for April, 1755, was enlarged "four pages extraordinary," and even then the usual catalogue of new books omitted, to make room for a copious notice of the Dictionary, in which some imperfections are rather hinted at than enumerated. Thomas Warton, in a letter to his brother, after admitting that "the preface was noble, and the history of the language pretty full," complains that "strokes of laxity and indolence were plainly to be perceived." "Laxity and indolence" there will always be in the works of man; but vigour and industry there were also, else the Dictionary had never seen the light. In our life of WM. ADAMS, D.D., p. 37 of this Dictionary, we have quoted some remarks of Johnson upon this theme, to which the reader is referred. The book sold well, for a second edition was pub. within a year. This was a great triumph for the author, who declared that, of all his acquaintances, there were only two who, upon the publication of the work, did not endeavour to depress him with threats of censure from the public, or with objections learned from those who learned them from his own preface.

The Doctor displayed no little ingenuity in the preliminary arrangement of his material. Bishop Percy tells us: "Boswell's account of the manner in which Johnson compiled his Dictionary is confused and erroneous. He began his task (as he himself expressly described to me) by devoting his first care to a diligent perusal of all such English writers as were most correct in their language, and under every sentence which he meant to quote, he drew a line, and noted in the margin the first letter of the word under which it was to occur. He then delivered these books to his clerks, who transcribed each sentence on a separate slip of paper, and arranged the same under the word referred to. By these means he collected the several words and their different significations; and when the whole arrangement was alphabetically formed he gave the definitions of their meanings, and collected their etymologies from Skinner, Junius, and other writers on the subject."

Andrew Millar's exclamation of delight at the reception of the last sheet was less reverent than Johnson's pious rejoinder. We do not wonder at Millar's impatience. The "three years" stipulated for the undertaking proved to be more than seven, and the copyright-money (£1575) had long been in the hands of the lexicographer: we say the kanda,—for little went into his pocket, after satisfying the demands of his six amanuenses and discharging other expenses incurred in the prosecution of the work.

But we promised a few quotations respecting the Dictionary, and it is quite time they were before the reader. In the same year (1755) of the appearance of the review of Johnson's Dictionary in the Monthly Review, another, by Dr. Adam Smith, the political economist, was pub. in the (old) Edinburgh Review. Sir James Mackintosh tells us that "This review of Johnson's Dictionary is chiefly valuable as a proof that neither of these eminent persons was well qualified to write an English dictionary. The plan of Johnson and the specimens of Smith are alike faulty. At that period, indeed, neither the cultivation of our old literature, nor the study of the languages from which the English springs or to which it is related, nor the habit of observing the general structure of language, was so far advanced as to render it possible for this great work to approach perfection."—Preface to a Reprint in 1816 of the Edinburgh Review of 1755.

"His Dictionary, though distinguished neither by the philosophy nor by the erudition which illustrate the origin and history of words, is a noble monument of his powers and his literary knowledge, and even of his industry, though it betrays frequent symptoms of that constitutional indolence which must so often have overpowered him in so immense a labour."—Mackintosh's Life, Lon., 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.

"That laborious and gigantic task, a dictionary of the language. How it is executed is well known, and sufficiently surprising, considering that the learned author was a stranger to the Northern languages, on which English is radically grounded, and that the discoveries in grammar since made by Horne Tooke were then unknown."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Life of Johnson.

"Dr. Johnson, with great labour, has collected the various meanings of every word, and quoted the authorities; but it would have been an improvement if he had given an accurate definition of the precise meaning of every word, pointed out the way in which it ought to be employed with the greatest propriety, showed the various deviations from the original meaning which custom had so far established as to render allowable, and fixed the precise limits beyond which it could not be employed without becoming a vicious expression. With this view it would have been necessary to exhibit the nice distinctions which take place between words nearly synonymous, and without which many words can only be defined in such a manner that they must be considered as exactly synonymous. We omit making quotations from Johnson in order to point out these defects; and shall content ourselves with giving a few examples, to show in what manner, according to our idea, a dictionary of the English language ought to be compiled."—Encyc. Brit., edit. 7th, art. "Dictionary."

"Had Johnson left nothing but his Dictionary, one might have traced there a great intellect, a genuine man. Looking to its clearness of definition, its general solidity, honesty, insight, and successful method, it may be called the best of all Dictionaries. There is in it a kind of architectural nobleness; it stands there like a great solid square-built edifice, finished, symmetrically complete: you judge that a true Builder did it."—Cervantes's Hero-Worship.

"Of the Prefaces to his own or other men's works, it is not necessary to speak in detail. The most ambitious is that to the Dictionary, which is powerfully written, but promises more than it performs, when it professes to give a history of the English language; for it does very little more than give a series of passages from the writings in the Anglo-Saxon and English tongues of different ages. The Dictionary itself, with all its faults, still keeps its ground, and has had no successor that could supplant it. This is owing to the admirable plan of giving passages from the writers cited as authorities for each word, and this part of the design is very well executed. Hence the book becomes almost as entertaining to read as useful to consult. The more difficult task of definition has been less happily performed; but far better than the etymological part, which neither shows profound knowledge nor makes a successful application of it. The compiler appears to have satisfied himself with one or two authorities, and neither to have chosen them well nor consulted them with discrimination. Of any attempt at a deeper and more philosophical study, either as regards the structure or the grammar of our language, he cannot be said ever to have had the credit; but if he at any time was so far fortunate, Horne Tooke has very mercilessly stripped him of it."—LOAD BROUGHAM: Men of Letters, &c.

There have been many editions of Johnson's Dictionary, but we do not think it worth while to notice any save the best, that of the Rev. H. J. Todd, Lon., 1818, in 11 Pts., 1827, 3 vols. 4to; new edit., now (1856) in press, edited by Todd and Latham. Mr. H. G. Bohn has recently—in 1840, '50, and '54, all in imp. 8vo—pub. verbatim reprints of Johnson's own last folio edit.

4. DR. JOHNSON AS A CRITIC.

A comprehensive view of Dr. Johnson's critical writings would of course include many of his numerous contributions to the Gentleman's Magazine, the Universal Visitor, The Literary Magazine or Universal Review, The Poetical Calendar, The London Chronicle, The Critical Review, &c.; but these articles are almost all of them unknown to the general reader, and of many the evidence of authorship is by no means unquestionable. When reference is made to the critical writings of Johnson, it is understood that the Preface and Notes to Shakespeare, and the Lives of the British Poets, are in the mind of the speaker. To each of these works, therefore, we must devote a few lines. We say "a few lines;" and, indeed, did our space permit, we have little disposition to dwell upon Dr. Johnson as a commentator upon Shakespeare. We will fight manfully for the Preface, but after that the point of our lance acknowledges the influence of the attraction of gravitation, and bends earthward. Francis Douce, one of the most erudite of literary antiquaries, thus despatches the critical doctor in a few words, much to the purpose:

"The indefatigable exertions of Messrs. Stevens, Malone, Tyrwhitt, and Mason, will ever be duly appreciated by the true and zealous admirer of Shakespeare's pages. If the name of a celebrated critic and moralist be not included on this occasion, it is because he was certainly unskilled in the knowledge of obsolete customs and expressions. His explanatory notes, therefore, are, generally speaking, the most controvertible of any; but no future editor will discharge his duty to the public, who shall omit a single sentence of this writer's masterly preface, or of his sound and tasteful characters of the text of Shakespeare."

Again:

"No disparagement is meant to the memory or talents of one of the greatest of men, when a protest is entered against the text of Dr. Johnson."

We well remember our astonishment at Johnson's criticism upon Proteus's speech in the Two Gentlemen of Verona, where he charges Shakespeare with a blunder in making the enamoured young gallant say,

"'Tis but her picture I have yet beheld,

And that hath dazzled my reason's light."

"Why," says the Doctor, "he had an interview with Silvia, and yet talks of having only seen her picture!" The literal commentator did not make sufficient allowance for the rhetoric of lovers. That there should be much valuable matter, and many sensible observations, contained in such a body of notes by such a writer, is a matter of course. The errors and misconceptions which prove the critic's unfitness for his task afford another proof of what even wise men often forget,—that no amount of genius, no extent of general knowledge, will qualify an author for a particular field without particular preparation. The Monthly Review (vol. xxviii., 1765) devotes no less than thirty pages to a notice (by no means complimentary) of Johnson's Shakespeare, and to this article, from which we had intended to quote, we must refer the reader. Johnson's edit. of Shakespeare appeared in 1765, 8 vols. 8vo. His principal predecessors as commentators on the great poet were: 1. Rymer, 1678; 2. Dennis, 1693; 3. Gildon, 1694; 4. Pope, 1725; 5. Theobald, 1726; 6. Peck, 1740; 7. Sir Thomas Hanmer, 1745; 8. Grey, 1746; 9. Warburton, 1747; 10. Upton, 1748; 11. Whalley, 1748; 12. Edwards, 1748; 13. Holt, 1749; 14. Charlotte Lennox, 1753-54; 15. Cooper, 1755; 16. Howard, 1756; 17. Capell, 1759; 18. Heath, 1765.

Before we leave this period—the date of the publication of Johnson's Shakespeare—we must refer the reader to the fierce attack of Kenrick (Goldsmith's malignant foe) upon the new editor, pub. in the Monthly Review for December, 1765. Warburton's savage assault upon Johnson, in revenge for his temerity in modestly questioning some of that commentator's critical canons or annotations, is exactly what might have been expected from that amiable and courteous (!) prelate. See Letters from a late eminent Prelate to one of his Friends, (Bishop Hurd,) 1808, pp. 272-273.

But it is quite time that we had turned our attention to the opinions of critics of a more modern period:

"The Preface to his Shakespeare, certainly, is far superior to his other introductory discourses, both fuller of matter and more elaborate. His remarks on the great dramatist are, generally speaking, sound and judicious; many of them may even, on a subject sufficiently hackneyed, be deemed original. The boldness with which his many critical objections were offered deserves not the less praise that Shakespeare's numberless and gross faults are easy to discern; because, in presence of the multitude, we might say even of the English nation at large, their obvious nature and considerable magnitude has never made them very safe to dwell upon. . . . The Preface is more to be commended than the work itself. As a commentator, he is certainly far from successful."—LORD BROUGHAM: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

"Johnson compares him who should endeavour to recommend this poet by passages unconnectedly torn from his works, to the pedant in Hierocles who exhibited a brick as a sample of his house. And yet how little, and how very unsatisfactorily, does he himself speak of the pieces considered as a whole! Let any man, for instance, bring together the short characters which he gives at the close of each play, and see if the aggregate will amount to that sum of admiration which he himself, at his outset, has stated as the correct standard for the appreciation of the poet."—A. W. Schlegel's Lects. on Dramat. Art and Lit., Black's Trans., Lon., 1846, 360. See also pp. 366, 369.

"Johnson's Preface is doubtless a great and masterly performance, evincing a mind of large general powers, and is executed throughout with uncommon dignity and effect. There are those who elevate it to the skies; but there is also a considerable number of well-read Shakespearians who are far from bowing with unqualified submission to the critical canons which it contains. . . . Johnson's critical summary of the preponderating merits and demerits of each play should be always a concomitant of every edition of Shakespeare."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1828, 808.

"Johnson explained much well, but there is something magisterial in the manner wherein he dismisses each play like a boy's exercise, that irritates the reader. His criticism is frequently judicious, but betrays no ardent admiration for Shakespeare."—HALLAM: Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, III. 94.

No portion of Johnson's writings has been so warmly praised, and so severely censured, as the Lives of the English Poets. Sir Egerton Brydges, in the Preface to his edit. of Phillips's Theatrum Poetarum Anglicanorum, complains lamentably of the false taste of the age which considered the poetical school of Pope the highest in the Republic of Letters:

"Dr. Johnson," he continues, "whose Lives of the Poets are extremely valuable, from the knowledge of life they display, from their morality, and from that acuteness of investigation and vigor of expression which his astonishing powers of intellect threw on every subject in which he engaged, has yet contributed to authorize this degraded taste. For candor ought to confess that a feeling for the higher kinds of poetry was not among his excellencies. Is it possible for those to doubt it who recollect the opinion he has expressed of Milton's Lucidas, and of the Odes of Gray? Who remember that he has scarce mentioned the Fables of Dryden, and that he has hardly conferred even a cold extorted praise on the Ode to the Passions, by Collins? Who must admit, that, among the modern poets who have pretensions to excellence in that art, there are but two, except his favorite Pope, to whose merits he has done any tolerable justice! These are Thomson and Young; of whom he has spoken, of one with noble and discriminative praise; and the poetical character of the other he has celebrated with a warm and happy splendor of eloquence, which is perhaps the finest passage in all the efforts of his pen."—xiii., et infra, and ivii.

Read another article on Johnson, by Sir S. E. Brydges, in his Imaginative Biography, vol. II. 251.

"Wherever understanding alone is sufficient for poetical criticism, the decisions of Johnson are generally right. But the beauties of poetry must be felt before their causes are investigated. There is a poetical sensibility, which in the progress of the mind becomes as distinct a power as a musical ear or a picturesque eye. Without a considerable degree of this sensibility, it is as vain for a man of the greatest understanding to speak of the higher beauties of poetry, as it is for a blind man to speak of colours. To adopt the warmest sentiments of poetry, to realize its holdest imagery, to yield to every impulse of enthusiasm, to submit to the illusions of fancy, to retire with the poet into his ideal worlds, were dispositions wholly foreign from the worldly sagacity and stern abstinence of Johnson. As in his judgment of life and character, so in his criticism on poetry, he was a sort of Freethinker. He suspected the refined of affectation, he rejected the enthusiastic as absurd, and he took it for granted that the mysterious was unintelligible. He came into the world when the school of Dryden and Pope gave the law to English poetry. In that school he had himself learned to be a lofty and vigorous declaimer in harmonious verse; beyond that school his unforced admiration perhaps scarcely soared; and his highest effort of criticism was accordingly the noble panegyric on Dryden. His criticism owed its popularity as much to its defects as to its excellencies. It was on a level with the majority of readers, —persons of good sense and information, but of no exquisite sensibility,—and to their minds it derived a false appearance of solidity from the very narrowness which excluded those grander efforts of imagination to which Aristotle and Bacon confined the name of poetry."—Sir JAMES MACGILLIVRA: Memoirs of his Life and Writings, Lon., 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.

See also his Review of Rogers's Poems, in his Works, 1854, vol. II. 505-506.

"Johnson seems to have conceived, like Milton, a theory that good writing, at least in verse, is never either to follow the change of fashion, or to sink into familiar phrase, and that any deviation from this rigour should be branded as low and colloquial."—HALLAM's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, III. 486.

"Johnson strips many a leaf from every laurel; still, Johnson's is the finest critical work extant, and can never be read without instruction and delight. . . . The opinions of that truly great man, whom it is also the present fashion to decry, will ever be received by me with that deference which time will restore to him from all."—LORD BYRON.

"One of his most pleasing as well as most popular works, The Lives of the British Poets, which he executed with a degree of critical force and talent which has seldom been concentrated."—Sir WALTER SCOTT: Life of Samuel Johnson.

Sir Archibald Alison remarks that few now read

"The Lives of the Poets, interesting as they are, and admirable as are the criticisms on our greatest authors which they contain."—Essays, 1850, III. 392.

"The merit of this work is very great, whether we regard the matter or the style; for the composition is far more easy and natural, far less pompous and stately, and the diction both more picturesque and more simple, than in any other of his writings. The measured period, the balance of sentences, and the diffusiveness arising from this desire of symmetry, is still in a good degree retained; but it is far less constant, and therefore falls less on the appetite, than in any of his former works."—LORD BROUGHAM: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

"Johnson decided literary questions like a lawyer, not like a legislator. He never examined foundations where a point was already ruled. His whole code of criticism rested on pure assumption, for which he sometimes quoted a precedent or an authority, but rarely troubled himself to give a reason drawn from the nature of things. He took it for granted that the kind of poetry which flourished in his own time, which he had been accustomed to hear praised from his childhood, and which he had himself written with success, was the best kind of poetry. . . . The judgments which Johnson passed on books were in his own time regarded with superstitious veneration, and in our time are generally treated with indiscriminate contempt."—T. B. MACAULAY: Crit. and Hist. Essays, Lon., 1854, I. 390, 392; from the Edin. Rev., Sept. 1831.

The incorrectness of this assertion must be obvious to the reader who has perused the opinions just quoted; and it is easy for us to add to the evidence already presented of Mr. Macaulay's very grave error. As regards ourselves, we profess to fairly present each, but to embrace neither, side of these literary controversies.

The opinion of Christopher North will doubtless have great weight with many readers:

"NORTH: 'Johnson's mind was a furnace: it reduced every thing to its elements. We have no truly great critical intellect since his time.'

"BULLER: 'What would he have thought of our modern reviewers?'

"NORTH: 'Why, not one of the tribe would have dared to cry mew, had he been alive. The terror of him would have kept them as mum as mice when there's a cat in the room. If he had detected such a thing as Jeffrey said, he would have cracked every bone in his body with one worry.'

"BULLER: 'I can believe it all. Even Gifford would have been annihilated.'

"NORTH: 'Like an ill-treated pug-dog flung into a lion's cage.'"

—Noctes Ambrosianae, April, 1832.

"He had his prejudices, and his partialities, and his bigotries, and his blindnesses, but on the same fruit-tree you see shrivelled pears or apples on the same branch with jargonelles or golden pippins worthy of Paradise. . . . Show me the critique that beats his on Pope and on Dryden,—nay, even on Milton; and hang me if you may not read his Essay on Shakespeare even after having read Charles Lamb or heard Coleridge, with increased admiration of the powers of all three, and of their insight through different avenues, and, as it might seem, almost with different bodily and mental organs, into Shakespeare's 'old exhausted' and his 'new imagined' worlds.' He was a critic and a moralist who would have been wholly wise had he not been partly constitutionally insane."—CHRISTOPHER NORTH: Notes Ambrosianae, April, 1829.

"There is an amiable desire shown to give merit its reward; nor do the author's prejudices interfere with this just course, except in a very few instances of political feelings warping his judgment, or indignation at impiety blinding him to literary excellence, or of admiration for religious purity giving slender merits an exaggerated value in his eyes. The justness of his taste may be in all other cases admitted; great critical acuteness is everywhere exercised; extensive reading of ancient and modern poetry is shown; and occasionally philosophical subjects are handled with considerable happiness both of thought and of illustration."—LORD BROUGHAM: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

"Johnson has himself done great good by exposing great faults in great authors. His criticism on Milton's highest work is the most valuable of all his writings. He seldom is erroneous in his censures, but he never is sufficiently excited to admiration of what is purest and highest in poetry."—W. SAVAGE LONDON.

In another part of his writings, Landor concurs in a censure frequently urged against Johnson of injustice to Milton on account of party prejudices. This subject must be glanced at before we leave our theme.

"Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets are necessarily a prominent ornament of every library, as they have been the common theme of admiration of all countries. The style and the reflections are the chief charm of this popular work. Many of the facts must be cautiously admitted. Not that Johnson designedly falsified; but he always wanted time, diligence, and patience in the collection of his materials; and he rejoiced to find the fact as he wished to find it, without sufficiently weighing it in the balance of impartiality. He swapped every thing which he thought might throw a shade on a republican, a whig, or a dissenter, and spared no pains in executing such a picture in his most powerful and overwhelming colours."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1826, 521, n.

We shall now introduce some brief extracts from the graceful pen of the distinguished author of the History of Ferdinand and Isabella:

"Johnson's work, as every one knows, is conducted on the most capricious and irregular plan. . . . Besides these defects of plan, the critic was certainly deficient in sensibility to the more delicate, the minor beauties of poetic sentiment. He analyses verse in the cold-blooded spirit of a chemist, until all the aroma which constituted its principal charm escapes in the decomposition. By this kind of process, some of the finest fancies of the Muse, the lofty dithyrambs of Gray, the ethereal effusions of Collins, and of Milton too, are rendered sufficientlyapid."

This accomplished critic proceeds to point out what he esteems to be defects in the Doctor's taste in composition, and the graver objections to his work arising from the effects of religious and political prejudices, and then continues:

"With all this, there is no one of the works of this great and good man in which he has displayed more of the strength of his mighty intellect, shown a more pure and masculine morality, more sound principles of criticism in the abstract, and more acute delineation of character, and more gorgeous splendour of diction."

Johnson's Life of Milton, however, does not escape Mr. Prescott's severe animadversions:

"A production more discreditable to the author is not to be found in the whole of his voluminous works; equally discreditable, whether regarded in an historical light or as a sample of literary criticism. . . . His life of Milton is a humiliating testimony of the power of political and religious prejudices to warp a great and good mind from the standard of truth, in the estimation not merely of contemporary excellence, but of the great of other years, over whose frailties Time might be supposed to have drawn his friendly mantle."—Prescott's Miscellanies, ed. 1855, 267, 268, 277, 278, and in North Amer. Review for October, 1839.

John Foster warms with equal indignation at the same theme:

"There are parts of the Lives of the Poets which every lover of literary or moral justice would be glad to see stamped with an indelible brand of reprobation, with a disgrace so signal and pernicious as to be a perpetual warning against the perversion of criticism and private history by political and religious bigotry and personal spleen."—Criticism on the English Poets: Foster's Essays, Lon., 1856, i. 145, and in Econ. Rev., March, 1868.

Foster then proceeds to specify the instances of Milton and Gray: he is eloquent, and we would fain quote more of his flowing rhetoric; but this must not be.

Even Dr. Drake, one of Johnson's warmest admirers, does not venture to enter a plea of "Not Guilty" on Johnson's behalf:

"No man can entertain a higher idea of Johnson's intellectual powers, as a lexicographer, a teacher, and a moralist, than myself; but poetical criticism was not his province; and though in point of style his Lives be superior, perhaps, to any of his preceding compositions, they are infinitely more disgraced by the inextinguishable partialities of the man."—Drake's Literary Hours, vol. i. 22.

Cumberland, Johnson's old friend, writing long after the Doctor's death, is disposed to treat the indignant outcry elicited by these strictures of the latter with very little respect:

"He was an acute and able critic: the enthusiastic admirers of Milton and the friends of Gray will have something to complain of, but criticism is a task which no man executes to all men's satisfaction. . . . A work of merit, which abounds in beauties far more prominent than its defects, and much more pleasing to contemplate."—Cumberland's Memoirs: Samuel Johnson.

Dr. Channing is more lenient to Johnson than many of Milton's apologists are disposed to be:

"We could find no pleasure in sacrificing one great man to the whims of another. . . . He did not and he could not appreciate Milton. We doubt whether two other minds, having so little in common as those of which we are speaking, can be found in the higher walks of literature. Johnson was great in his own sphere, but that sphere was comparatively of 'the earth,' while Milton's was only inferior to that of angels. It was customary, in the day of Johnson's glory, to call him a giant, to class him with a mighty but still an earth-born race. Milton we should rank among seraphs."

Channing proceeds in this truly-eloquent strain for some lines, and then applies the contrast to the reader's own judgment, by demanding,

"How could Johnson be just to Milton?"—Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton.

Johnson here escapes far more easily than he generally does when arraigned for this oft-urged offence, and this mitigation of punishment will be demurred at by many of the champions of the immortal Milton. But we have a higher defence to plead, (or rather to adduce, for we plead nothing on either side;) nothing less than an entire acquittal of the alleged culprit:

"That he had strong prepossessions against Milton's political opinions cannot be doubted; but it is extremely incorrect to affirm, as has been too generally affirmed, that this feeling made him unfair to that great poet's merits. No one can read his criticism on Paradise Lost, without perceiving that he places it next to the Iliad, and in some respects on an equal, if not a higher, level. The praise of it in The Rambler is equally ample. His objections are not at all groundless; and, although to the lesser pieces he may not be equally just, it is certain that, except to the Lyrics, he shows no very marked unfairness, while, in observing the faults of the others, he largely commemorates their beauties."—LORD BROUGHAM: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

As regards the literary merits of Johnson's review of PARADISE LOST, perhaps many scholars, of all classes of opinions, will acknowledge a participation, to some extent, in the enthusiasm which animates the glowing eulogy of Dibdin:

"Who that reads Johnson's criticisms on certain portions of the Paradise Lost is not convinced that he is reading one of the most masterly performances of the human intellect? exhibiting an extent and power of conception—a vigour and felicity of diction—such as one knows not where to find equalled in any modern production."—Lib. Comp., ed. 1826, 521.

Before leaving this part of our subject we must not omit to notice an edit. recently issued (Lon., 1854, 3 vols. 8vo) of Johnson's Lives of the British Poets, with Notes, corrective and explanatory, by Peter Cunningham. This the collector of a "Johnsonian Library" must immediately procure. A new impression of Haslitt's ed. of the Lives of the Poets was also pub., Lon., 1854, 4 vols. 8vo. We may add that he will find a valuable guide to Johnsonians in the list furnished by Lowndes (containing about sixty books) in the Bibliographer's Manual, 1032-1033. See also Index to Blackw. Mag., vols. i.-1.

5. DR. JOHNSON'S STYLE OF COMPOSITION.

In this department of our subject also we shall have something to produce on both sides of the question:

"To Johnson may be attributed the establishment of our present refinement, and it is with truth he observes of his Rambler, 'That he had laboured to refine our language to grammatical purity, and to clear it from colloquial barbarisms, locutions idiom, and irregular combinations, and that he has added to the elegance of its construction and to the harmony of its cadence.'"—Drapach's Miscell. of Lit. & Style, ed. Lon., 1840, 7.

"Junius and Johnson were the first who again familiarised us with more glowing and sonorous diction, and made us feel the tameness and poorness of the serious style of Addison and Swift."—LORD JEFFREY: Contrib. to the Edin. Rev., Lon., 1823, 77, and in Edin. Rev., Sept. 1816.

We know not where we can better quote Lord Jeffrey's description of Johnson as "that great master of reason," (Edin. Rev., xv. 175,) and Sir Archibald Alison's assertion (Hist. of Europe, 1789-1815, chap. ix.) that Dr. Johnson was "the strongest intellect and the most profound observer of the eighteenth century."

"The distinguishing excellence of Johnson's manner, both in speaking and writing, consists in the apt and lively illustrations by example with which, in his vigorous sallies, he enforces his just and acute remarks on human life and manners, in all their modes and representations; the character and charm of his style, in a happy choice of dignified and appropriate expressions, and that masterly resolution of phrase by which he contrives to bolt the prominent ideas strongly on the mind."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 9-10.

"At length rose the Colossus of English Philology, SAMUEL JOHNSON, having secretly and unremittently formed his style upon the basis of that of Sir Thomas Browne, a name in every respect to be held in grateful remembrance. But Johnson, as a philologist, is almost an original; and doubtless among the very foremost in the ranks of the literature of his country. And yet, I know not how it is, but as years creep on we do not read his pages with that devoted enthusiasm which we did in our college days: for where is the man who, having turned his thirtieth year, peruses either Rasselas or the Rambler?"—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1826, 617-618.

"His writings will live forever, still more and more studied and admired, while Britons shall continue to be characterized by a love of elegance and sublimity, of good sense and virtue."—Boswell's Memoirs.

"Johnson's first style was naturally energetic; his middle style was turgid to a fault; his later style was softened down and harmonized into periods more tuneful and more intelligible."—Quarterly Review.

"A love of hard and learned words prevailed throughout; and a fondness for balanced periods was its special characteristic. But there was often great felicity in the expression, occasionally a pleasing cadence in the rhythm, generally an epigrammatic turn in the language, as well as in the idea. Even where the workmanship seemed meant to surpass the material, and the word-craft to be exercised needlessly and the diction to run to waste, there was never any feeling to complain of, and always something of skill and effect to admire. The charm of nature was ever wanting, but the presence of great art was undeniable. Nothing was even of the careless aspect which the highest of artists ever give their masterpieces,—the produce of elaborate but concealed pains; yet the strong hand of an able workman was always marked; and it was observed, too, that he had declined to hide from us the far less labour which he had much more easily bestowed. There is no denying that some of Johnson's works, from the meagreness of the material and the regularity of the monotonous style, are exceedingly little adapted to reading. They are flimsy, and they are dull; they are pompous and, though full of undeniable—indeed, self-evident—truths, they are somewhat empty; they are, moreover, wrapped up in a style a disproportioned in its importance, that the perusal becomes very tiresome, and is soon given up. This character belongs more especially to the Rambler, the object of such unmeasured praises among his followers, and from which he derived the title of the Great Moralist."—Lord Brougham: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

The reader will find a continuation of his lordship's remarks in our notice of the Rambler in a preceding page. The noble critic places the Life of Cowley at "the head of all" the author's writings, and (as we have already intimated) considers the review of Beattie's Jenny's Inquiry into the Origin of Evil "one of his happiest performances."

"The third period [in the progress of English style] may be called the Rhetorical, and is distinguished by the prevalence of a school of writers of which Johnson was the founder. The fundamental character of this style is that it employs undigested or where classical writers appear only to obey the impulse of a cultivated and adorned nature. . . .

"As the mind of Johnson was robust, but neither nimble nor graceful, so his style, though sometimes significant, nervous, and even majestic, was void of all grace and ease; and, being the most unlike of all styles to the natural effusion of a cultivated mind, had the least pretensions to the praise of eloquence. During this period, now near a close, in which he was a favourite model, a stiff symmetry and tedious monotony succeeded to that various music with which the taste of Addison diversified his periods, and to the natural imagery which his beautiful genius seemed, with graceful negligence, to scatter over his composition."—Sir James Mackintosh: Memoirs of his Life, 1855, 2 vols. 8vo.

"What most distinguishes Dr. Johnson from other writers is the pomp and uniformity of his style. All his periods are cast in the same mould, are of the same size and shape, and, consequently have little fitness to the variety of things he professes to treat of. His subjects are familiar, but the author is always upon stilts. He has neither ease nor simplicity, and his efforts at playfulness are but remind one of the lines in Milton:

"The elephant
To make them sport wreathed his proboscis litha."'

"All his books are written in a learned language; in a language which nobody hears from his mother or his nurse; in a language in which nobody ever quarrels, or drives bargains, or makes love in a language in which nobody ever thinks. . . . Mannerism is pardonable, and is sometimes even agreeable, when the manner though vicious, is natural. Few readers, for example, would be willing to part with the mannerism of Milton or Burke. But mannerism which does not sit easy on the mannerist—which has been adopted on principle, and which can be sustained only by constant effort—is always offensive. And such is the mannerism of Johnson."—T. B. Macaulay: Crit. and Hist. Essays, Lond., 1861, i. 398-399; and in Edin. Rev., Sept. 1851.

"The Doctor's taste in composition," remarks Mr. Prescott, in his notice of Johnson's Lives of the Poets, just quoted from, "I judge from his own style, was not of the highest order. It was style, indeed, of extraordinary power, suited to the expression of his original thinking, bold, vigorous, and glowing with all the lustre of polished antithesis. But the brilliancy is cold, and the ornaments are much too solid and overcharged for a graceful effect."—Miscellany, 1866, 245.

"No man," remarks one of the greatest masters of the English tongue, "contemplates with greater tenderness than we do the frailties of Dr. Johnson; none respects more the sound parts of his moral system, or admires more the vigor of the elephantine strength with which he sometimes tramples down innocent error and presumptuous sophistry. But let no young man who wishes to learn to write well study his style."—Edward Everett: N. Amer. Rev. xii. 3-4.

It was formerly greatly the fashion to copy, or to endeavour to copy, the "Johnsonian style." Mr. Macaulay declared (review of Croker's Boswell, Edin. Rev., Sep. 1831) that Johnson's "peculiarities have been imitated by his admirers, and parodied by his assailants, till the public has become sick of the subject."

A critic in the same periodical (for Oct. 1850) remarks that

"It is not easy for those who have not inspected contemporaneous literature,—especially its second-rate productions,—to conceive to what an extent Johnson's style was imitated by his admirers."—Vol. xii. 398.

Sir James Mackintosh observes, as late as 1831, that "From the corruptions introduced by Dr. Johnson, English style was only then recovering."

Disraeli says: "Such was the influence of the elaborate novelty of Johnson, that every writer in every class servilely copied the Latinized style, ludicrously mimicking the contortions and re-echoing the sonorous nothings, of our great lexicographer. The moralist of domestic life, or the agriculturist in a treatise on turnips, alike aimed at the polysyllabic force and the cadenced period. Such was the condition of English style for more than twenty years."—Miscell. of Lit. & Style, ed. Lond., 1840, 8.

"At present," says Halliwell, in his Sixth Lecture on the English Poets, delivered at the Surrey Institution in 1818, "we cannot see a not think Mr. Currier would grudge such a title to you." "Sir," said he, with a stern look, "I have known David Currier longer than you have done, and I know no right you have to talk to me on the subject." Perhaps I deserved this rebuff, for it was rather presumptuous in me, as editor-in-chief, to express any doubt of the accuracy of his statements upon his old acquaintance and friend. I was left myself much mortified, and began to think that the hope I had long indulged of obtaining his acquaintance was blasted. And, in truth, had not my reader been uncommonly strong and my resolution unshakably pursuing, as rough a reception might have deterred me forever from making any further attempt. Fortunately, however, I remained upon the field, not wholly discouraged, and was soon rewarded by hearing some of his conversation, of which I preserved the following short extracts, without marking the questions and observations by which it was produced.—"Boswell's Life of Johnson, Craker's ed., Lon., 1866, r. 6vo, 12s-16s. See the note to p. 126 for a vindication of Currier, or rather, of the evidence of his liberality.

The acquaintance thus commenced was ardently cultivated by Boswell; and until his great friend's demise, more than twenty years after this first interview.

"The worship of Johnson was his grand ideal, voluntary business. Down the frothy-headed poet, enthusiastic man, duffing his admirer's wig, regularly takes post, and bary up to London, for the sake of his own child, as to a Point of Sublimation, the habitude of his whole year?"—Currier's Review of Boswell's Johnson.

How faithfully he did service in embalming the droppings of wisdom which fell from those revered lips, we have many evidences, and some more striking than those related by Miss Burney:

"When in that presence," says the fair narrator, "he was unobtrusive, if not contemptuous, of every one else. In truth, when he met with Dr. Johnson, he commonly threw even on things that was said, or attempted to say, thing that he had to do should make the smallest noise from that voice, and he should make the smallest noise from that voice. But the voice, however, to the effect, which it seemed on, descended almost to the floor. He was galled with a least his air about on the shoulder of the doctor, as dropped upon to catch every syllable that might be to him. He seemed not only to draw being a word, but to be to take a breathing, as if hoping from it intently, or mystically, some information."

The great man was not so much constituted by this extraordinary deference as to always endure Boswell's curiosity himself. On one occasion, when Boswell had been for some time persisting in questioning him with, "What did you do, sir?" "What did you say, sir?" &c., Johnson at last lost all patience, and exclaimed, "I will not be put to the question, sir! Do you not consider, sir, that these are not the manners of a gentleman? I will not be bothered with what and why. What is this? What is that? Why is a cow's tail long? Why is a fox's tail bushy?" "Why, sir," pleaded Boswell, "you are so good that I venture to trouble you." "Sir," rejoined Johnson, "my being so good is no reason why you should be so ill."

"He was, if we are to give any credit to his own account or to the united testimony of all who knew him, a man of the moment and fastest intellect. Johnson described him as a fellow who had mined his only chance of immortality by not having been alive when the Dunciad was written. Boswell used his name as a proverbial expression for a bore. He was the laughing-stock of the whole of that brilliant society which was owed to him the greater part of its fame. Every thing which another would have hidden, every thing the publication of which would have made another man hang himself, was matter of gay and clamorous mention to his wit and drollery. What silly things he said, what bitter remarks he provoked, how at one place he was troubled with evil communications which came to nothing, how at another place, on taking down a drunken dame, he read the Prayer Book and took a hair of the dog that had bitten him, how he went to see men hanged and came away maddened, how he added five hundred pounds to the fortune of one of his ladies because he was not married at Johnson's ugly son, how his father, and the very wife of his bosom, laughed and fretted at his failures,—all these things he proclaimed to all the world, as if they had been subjects for pride and ostentatious rejoicing. All the episodes of his temper, all the blunders of his vanity, all his hypocritical whimsies, all his malice in the air, he displayed with a cool self-complacency a perfect consciousness that he was making a fool of himself, to which it is impossible to find a parallel in the whole history of mankind. He has used many people ill, but scarcely he has used nobody so ill as himself."

Of all the talents which ordinarily refer men to numbers as writers, Boswell had abundantly none. There is not in all his books a single remark of his own on literature, politics, religion, or society, which is not either commonplace or absurd. His observations on hereditary gentility, on the slave-trade, and on the confining of lunatic inmates, may serve as examples. To say that these passages are consistent would be to pay them an extravagant compliment. They have no pretence to argument or even to meaning. He has supported innumerable observations made by himself in the course of conversation. Of these observations we do not remember one which is above the intellectual capacity of a boy of fifteen. He has printed many of his own letters, and in these letters he is always railing or twaddling."—Stamps, 1864, l. 8vo, 5s, 5s, 5s, 5s.

This is an admirably-drawn portrait, and, unfortunately for the subject, those who have been inclined to think it too highly coloured will perhaps be less disposed to question the faithfulness of the artist after reading some of Boswell's Letters to the Rev. W. J. Temple, just brought to light in a most remarkable manner, (if we are to believe the story,) and pub. in 1867. See reviews of these Letters in Edin. Rev., April, 1867; Lon. Gent. Mag., Feb., 1867; Lon. Athenaeum, Dec. 27, 1854; the Spectator, Times, &c. But really we think Mr. Macaulay is more guilty of something which borders on caricature. Boswell was certainly not quite such a bore and perennial fool as his critic makes him appear. Schiller is disposed to ridicule the avidity with which the English devour

"These monstrous myriads which Boswell has collected as if they were pearls and diamonds. Boswell has by the extirpation of all the trifles, personal anecdotes, and miscellaneous matters which refer to Götting, and the English have, as thankfully and with as much curiosity, swallowed every triviality about this much-admired and worshipped critic and artist in town and literature, as the Germans every trifling anecdote about their greatest poet and prose-writer."—Schiller's Hist. of the Eighteenth Cent., &c., Berlin's Times, Lon., 1866, vol. 9, 6s.

But who can marvel that all who love the English tongue and English Republic of Letters are in love with this indomitable biography, when it must be admitted that—so quote the language of one of the greatest of modern writers—

"Considering the enormous power to which Boswell's Life of Johnson raises, the quantity of miscellaneous information and entertaining gossip which it brings together, it may be termed, without exception, the best post-mortem book that ever was written."

—Don WILSON SMITH.

But we are forgetting to give some description of the APPEARANCE of the great man, as promised in our last heading. Miss Burney's pencil shall be again called to our aid:

"He is, indeed, very ill-favoured! Yet he has naturally a noble figure,—tall, stout, grand, and authoritative—but he seems hardly; his back is quite round, his mouth is continually opening and shutting, as if he were chewing something; he has a singular method of twisting his fingers and twisting his hands; his vast body is in constant agitation, moving backwards and forwards; his feet are never a moment quiet, and his whole great person seemed often as if it were going to roll itself, quite voluntarily, from its chair to the floor."

Perhaps no one has better described the dream of this strange-looking giant than the famous satirical poet of the day:

"Methinks I view his fell, plain coat of brown,
The large grey bushy wig, that graced his crown;
Black curled stockings, little droll buckles,
And short, that had no ruffes for his buckles.
I mark the brown greatness of cloth he wore,
That two huge Pateenches pushed him
Which Pateenches (wondrous to unfold!)
Would fairly both his Dictatorate hold."—PURAN PUNIAN.

We shall have more to quote respecting Johnson's appearance before we have finished this article. Let us now turn to his CONVERSATION, in the descriptions of which his MANNERS will, of course, come more or less under notice. In our introductory quotation, indeed, (from Miss Burney,) Johnson's manners, or want of manners, occupy a prominent place.

Boswell's Life of Johnson has given a wrong impression of him in some respects. When we see that large volume written upon a man's conversation, through a period of forty years, and his remarks about us down, of all those made at the time, we naturally take the idea that Johnson was the central point of society for all that period. The truth is, he never was in good society,—at least in those circles where men of letters mix with the fashionable world. His social intercourse scarcely extended him from it, of course. He met great society, to be sure, at the Literary Club and at Sir John Reynolds's. Often we asked why he did not talk more in the presence of Dr. Johnson. "Sir," replied the historian, taking a pinch of snuff, "I have no pretensions to the ability of conversing with Dr. Johnson in brutality and insolence."—Sir James Reynolds's Conversations with Alexander H. Boswell. N. Amer. Rev., XXIV. 442-446, &c.

Yet, notwithstanding the apparent severity of these strictures, no one had a higher opinion of Johnson's conversational abilities and moral worth than Sir James entertained, so we shall show on a future page.

Johnson himself had a satisfactory way of accounting for the absence of invitations to the tables of the great. "Lords and ladies," he remarked, "don't like to have their mouths stopped." But the truth is, as Lord Brougham very correctly remarks,

"That in those days no one was generally speaking, admitted into polite society merely for the intrinsic merits of his writings or his talk, without having some access to it through his rank or his political or professional estimation. It is equally erroneous to suppose that Johnson's rough exterior, or his unsmooth and even unpleasant habits, could have prevented his name and his conversation from being sought after to adorn respectable parties in later times. All these petty obstacles would have been easily got over by the vanity of having such a person to show, and, indeed, by the real interest which the display of his original powers would have possessed among a more refined and better-educated generation."—Life of Sir John, &c.

Horace Walpole was one of the principal leaders of fashion during the whole of Johnson's literary reign; and it is certain that he would never have subjected his aristocratic domains to the Gothic invasion of the lexicographer. The portrait which he has left us of Johnson is as little complimentary as that drawn by Sir James Mackintosh:

"With a lumber of learning and some strong parts," says Horace, "Johnson was an odious and mean character. By principle a Jacobite, arrogant, self-sufficient, and overbearing by nature, ungrateful through pride, and of feminine bigotry, he had prostituted his pen to party, even in a dictionary, and had afterwards, for a pension, contradicted his own definitions. His manners were sordid, supercilious, and brutal; his style ridiculously bombastic and vicious; and, in one word, with all the pedantry, he had all the gigantic littleness of a country schoolmaster."—Memoirs of the Reign of George III., vol. II. 323.

But much of the effect of the dark colours of this picture is lost upon the reader when he remembers Johnson's pertinacious opposition to Sir Robert Walpole's administration; and especially his admission to Sir George Staunton,—"which Horace had probably heard,—that, when he made parliamentary speeches for the Gentleman's Magazine, he "always took care to put Sir Robert Walpole in the wrong, and to say every thing he could against the electorate of Hanover." Johnson admitted very frankly that he did not forget his politics when composing these celebrated parliamentary speeches. When commended, long afterwards, for having "dealt out reason and eloquence with an equal hand to both parties," "That is not quite true," said Johnson: "I saved appearances tolerably well; but I took care that the Whig dogs should not have the best of it." With reference to Walpole's sketch of Johnson, just quoted, we may add that the celebrated Heroic Epistle in which Johnson is satirised was ascribed to Walpole, and also to Mason, or to both combined. Lord Chesterfield's description of Johnson, in a letter to his lordship's son, will at once recur to many of our readers. Boswell, and other contemporaneous chroniclers, certainly record many instances of colloquial bravure—to use the mildest term—on the part of the lexicographer, which could not have been altogether grateful to the feelings of even the humblest of the great man's admirers. Of these we had intended to quote some specimens, but our limited space forbids. One amusing incident, however, must not be omitted. In our life of Oliver Goldsmith we quoted George Colman's glowing tribute to the kindness of heart and manner which so pre-eminently distinguished that wayward son of genius. The same excellent story-teller—certainly one of the best of modern days—has left us the following far less flattering picture of Goldsmith's "guide, philosopher, and friend":

"My boyish mind had anticipated an awful impression when I was first brought unwittingly into the presence of the stupendous Johnson. I knew not then that he had 'a love for little children,' calling them 'pretty dears and giving them sweetmeats,' as Boswell hath since, in the simplicity of his heart, narrated. It was my hapless lot, however, to be excluded from the objects of this propension. Perhaps, at my age, of about fourteen, I might have been too old, or too ugly; but the idea of Johnson's carrying bonbons to give to children of any age is much like supposing that a Greenland bear has a pocket stuffed with tarts for travellers.

"On the day of my introduction he was asked to dinner at my father's house, in Soho-square, and the erudite savage came a full hour before his time. I happened to be with my father, who was beginning his toilette, when it was announced to him that the Doctor had arrived. My sire, being one of the tributary princes who did homage to this monarch, was somewhat flurried, and, having dressed himself hastily, took me with him into the drawing-room.

"On our entrance we found Johnson sitting in a fautuil of rose-coloured satin, the arms and legs of which (of the chair, remember, not of the Doctor) were of burnish'd gold, and the contrast of the man with the seat was very striking: an unwash'd coal-heaver in a vis-à-vis could not be much more misplaced than Johnson thus deposited. He was dressed in a rusty suit of brown cloth dross, with black worsted stockings; his old yellow wig was of formidable dimensions; and the learned head which sustained it roll'd about in a seemingly paralytic motion, but, in the performance of its orbit, it inclined chiefly to one shoulder, whether to the right or left I cannot now remember,—a fault never to be forgiven by certain of the Theodidacti, who think these matters of the utmost importance. He deign'd not to rise on our entrance, and we stood before him while he and my father talk'd. There was soon a pause in the colloquy; and my father, making his advantage of it, took me by the hand, and said, 'Doctor Johnson, this is a little Colman.' The Doctor bestow'd a slight, ungracious glance upon me, and, continuing the rotary motion of his head, renew'd the previous conversation. Again there was a pause;—again the anxious father, who had fail'd in his first effort, seized the opportunity for pushing his progeny, with, 'This is my son, Doctor Johnson.' The great man's contempt for me was now roused to great wrath; and, knitting his brows, he exclaim'd, in a voice of thunder, 'I see him, sir!' He then fell back in his rose-colour'd satin fautuil, as if giving himself up to meditation, implying that he would not be further plagued either with an old fool or a young one.

"The gigantic Johnson could not be easily thrown out at window, particularly by my under-sized sire; but he deserved to be 'quoted down stairs, like a shave-groat shilling;' not exactly, perhaps, for his brutality to the boy, but for such an unprovoked insult to the father of whose hospitalities he was partaking. This, however, is only one among the numerous traits of grossness already promulgated, in which the Bolt Court philosopher completely falsified the principles of the Roman poet:

'In genus dilicite fideliter artes,

Immollis moros, nec sinit esse ferus.'

"After this rude rebuff from the Doctor, I had the additional felicity to be placed next to him at dinner. He was silent over his meal; but I observed that he was, as Shylock says of Lancelot Gobbo, 'a huge feeder;' and, during the display of his voracity, (which was worthy of Bolt Court,) the perspiration fell in copious drops from his visage upon the table-cloth. The clumsiness of the bulky animal, his strange costume, his uncouth gestures, yet the dominion which he usurped withal, rendered his presence a phenomenon among gentlemen: it was the incursion of a new species of barbarian,—a learned Attila, King of the Huns, come to subjugate polish'd society. Oliver Goldsmith, several years before my luckless presentation to Johnson, proved how 'doctors differ':

Read the conclusion of this anecdote on page 693 of this Dictionary; commencing with,

"I was only five years old when Goldsmith took me on his knee," &c.

No one has made a better excuse for Johnson's occasional roughness, and even boorishness, than Sir Walter Scott; and to his pages (in his Life of Johnson) we must refer the reader:

"He was, in a word, despotic," remarks Sir Walter; "and despotism will occasionally lead the best dispositions into an unbecoming abuse of power. It is not likely that any one will again enjoy, or have an opportunity of abusing, the singular degree of submission which was rendered to Johnson by all around him."

The colloquial monarch, ruling in his "pride of place," has been well described by Lord Brougham:

"He loved to sit in a chair, surrounded with a circle well known to him, and as cathedra to deliver his judgments. It cannot be said that this was any thing like a high style of conversation. It had nothing in it like full or free discussion; it had even little like free interchange of sentiments or opinions. It was occasionally enlivened by wit, oftener broken by a growl or a sneer from him, and from him alone. But his part of it was always arrogant and dictatorial; nor, after men's curiosity had once been gratified by assisting at one of these talks, did any but the small number of his familiar and admiring friends often desire to repeat the experiment. His talk was most commonly for victory, rather than directed to the clearing up of rational doubt or the ascertaining of important truth; nor, unless upon the serious subject of religion, and upon some of the points involved in the Whig and Tory controversy, did he ever seem to care much on which side he argued, dogmatized, laughed boisterously, or sneered rudely."—Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

His wonderful conversational abilities have been the theme of unceasing eulogy from this day to our own, and cannot fail to excite the admiration of our latest successors.

"When animated by the cheering attention of friends whom he liked, he would give full scope to those talents for narration, in which I verily think he was unrivalled both in the brilliancy of his wit, the flow of his humour, and the energy of his language."—Cumberland's Memoirs.

"I do not care on what subject Johnson talks, but I love better to hear him talk than anybody; he either gives you new thoughts or a new colouring."—Orme, the Historian of India.

"The most triumphant record of the talents and character of Johnson is to be found in Boswell's Life of him. The man was superior to the author. When he laid aside his pen, which he regarded as an encumbrance, he became not only learned and thoughtful, but acute, witty, humorous, natural, honest, hearty, and determined: 'the king of good fellows and wale of old men.' There are as many smart repartees, profound remarks, and keen invectives to be found in Boswell's 'inventory of all he said,' as are recorded of any celebrated man. The life and dramatic play of his conversation forms a contrast to his written powers. His natural powers and undisguised opinions were called out in convivial intercourse. In public he practised with the foil: in private he unsheathed the sword of controversy, and it was the Ebro's temper."—Haslitt on the Periodical Essayists.

"There was a pith about old Samuel which nothing could stand up against. His influence was not so much that of an author as a thinker. He was the most powerful intellect in the world of books. He was the Jackson of the literary ring—the judge—the emperor—a giant—acknowledged to be a giant amongst the people. Even David Hume would have been like a woman in his grasp; but, odd enough, the two never met."—CHRISTOPHER NOBLE: Notes Ambrosiane, April 2, 1822.

"Boswell's Life of Johnson is so replete with the sayings and thoughts of the intellectual giant, whom it was so much his object to elevate, even above his natural Patagonian stature, that it may be regarded as a sort of autobiography, dictated by the sage, in his moments of abandon, to his devout worshipper. It is not going too far to say that it is among the most popular books in the English language. Johnson's reputation now mainly rests on that biography."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Essays, 1840, II. 362; and in Blackie's Mag., Sept. 1840.

"Johnson, as Mr. Burke most justly observed, appears far greater in Boswell's books than in his own. His conversation appears to have been quite equal to his writings in matter, and far superior to them in manner. When he talked, he clothed his wit and his sense in forcible and natural expressions. As soon as he took his pen in hand to write for the public, his style became systematically vicious. . . . The reputation of those writings which he probably expected to be immortal is every day fading; while those peculiarities of much greater store by his worth than by his fame."—Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

"He loved the poor as I never yet saw any one else love them, with an earnest desire to make them happy. In pursuance of these principles, he nursed whole nests of people in his house, where the lame, the blind, the sick, and the sorrowful found a sure retreat."—MRS. THORNTON.

"Though consciousness of superiority might sometimes induce him to carry it high with man, (and even this was much abated in the latter part of life), his devotions have shown to the whole world how humbly he walked at all times with his God."—BISHOP HOOKER.

"If, then, it be asked, who first, in England, at this period, breast the waves and stemmed the tide of infidelity,—who, enlisting wit and eloquence, together with argument and learning, on the side of revealed religion, first turned the literary current in its favour, and mainly prepared the reaction which succeeded,—that praise seems most justly to belong to Dr. Samuel Johnson. Religion was with him no mere lip-service nor cold formality: he was mindful of it in his social hours as much as in his graver lucubrations; and he brought to it, not merely erudition such as few indeed possessed, but the weight of the highest character, and the respect which even his enemies could not deny him. It may be said of him that, though not in orders, he did the Church of England better service than most of those who at that restless era ate her bread."—LORD MASON: Hist of England, vol. vi.

"His moral principles (if the language may be allowed) partook of the vigour of his understanding. He was conscientious, sincere, determined; and his pride was no more than a steady consciousness of superiority in the most valuable qualities of human nature. His friendships were not only firm, but generous and tender beneath a rugged exterior."—SIR JAMES MACINTOSH: Memoirs of his Life, 1835.

Sir Walter Scott remarks (in his Life of Johnson) that, when Johnson died, "virtue was deprived of a steady supporter," and that all the deductions which can be made for his prejudices of opinion and "violence and solecisms in manners" still leave "his talents, morals, and benevolence alike irreproachable."

Haslitt, (in his Lecture on the Periodical Essayists,) after summing up Johnson's many good qualities, and referring to his prejudices, concludes with:

"His were not time-serving, heartless, hypocritical prejudices; but deep, inveterate, not to be rooted out but with life and hope; which he found from old habit necessary to his own peace of mind, and thought so to the peace of mankind. I do not hate, but love, him for them. They were between himself and his conscience, and should be left to that higher tribunal."

"Where they in trembling hope repose,—
The bosom of his Father and his God."

"In a word, he has left behind him few wiser or better men." "That, with all his coarseness and irritability, he was a man of sterling benevolence, has long been acknowledged. But how gentle and endearing his deportment could be, was not known till the Recollections of Madame D'Arlay were published."—T. B. MACAULAY: Essays, 1854, ill. 300.

"The comparison which we have instituted [between Milton and Johnson] has compelled us to notice Johnson's defects; but we trust we are not blind to his merits. His stately march, his pomp and power of language, his strength of thought, his reverence for virtue and religion, his vigorous logic, his practical wisdom, his insight into the springs of human action, and the solemn pathos which occasionally pervades his descriptions of life and his references to his own history, command our willing admiration."—WM. ELLIS: CHANNING: Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton.

The accounts which have been handed down to us of the last days of Johnson's life form one of the most interesting portions of English literary annals. It was on the 13th of December, 1784, that he was called to the rest which remaineth for those who cast themselves in humble confidence and undoubting trust upon the promises of that Redeemer who is the saint's dependence and the sinner's hope. We may not doubt that to him the exchange was a happy one. Error there had been in his life; for who is there among the children of men who hath not transgressed? But there had been hearty repentance, deep contrition, and fervent faith. He had proved his faith, too, by works of charity and deeds of love. He had been literally "eyes to the blind and feet to the lame." He had "strengthened him that was ready to perish, and he had upholding the fallen." His bread had been "dealt to the hungry, and the poor and cast-out he had brought to his home." The promise was fulfilled to him, as it hath ever been to those who rely upon its merciful assurance: "In the time of trouble," God remembered him, and freed him from that "bondage" which had so long held him in "fear of death;" he resigned his soul into the hands of his Creator with alial confidence and triumphant hope.

Johnston, Alexander Keith, Geographer at Edinburgh in Ordinary to her Majesty, and one of the most useful writers of the day, was b. Dec. 28, 1804, at Kirkhill, in the county of Midlothian, Scotland. 1. The National Atlas of General and Physical Geography, Edin., imp. fol., 1843, £8 8s.; Index, 1848, 7s. 6d.; 2d ed., 1849, half-bound, £4 4s.; 3d ed., 1855, £4 14s. 6d.; plates and notes, half-Russia, £8 8s.

"As accurate in their geographical details as they are beautiful in their execution."—Sir David Brewster.

Also highly commended in Alison's Hist. of Europe, by Professors Traill and Jameson, by Dr. Whewell, Wm. Galbraith, and other eminent authorities.

2. The Physical Atlas of Natural Phenomena, 1847-49, imp. fol., 30 maps, £10 10s.; reduced ed., 1849, imp. 4to, 25 maps, £2 12s. 6d.; new ed., 1854-56, 12 Pts. fol., at 21s. each; £12 12s. complete.

"The execution of the plates corresponds, in the elegance and perspicuity of the engraving, with the scientific solidity of the materials."—Baron Alexander von Humboldt: & Sans Strict, 12th August, 1848.

"Your Atlas will do more benefit to the knowledge of our planet, in all its relations, than all the monstrous Encyclopedias, Cyclopedias, and Libraries of Useful Knowledge could effect."—Baron Leopold von Bunsen: Berlin, 3d July, 1848.

"I appreciate it highly, but not more than the admirable execution of so difficult and arduous a work merits."—Mary Somerville, Chester Square, 4th May, 1848.

We have many more testimonies before us to the excellence of this work, but either of the three preceding is amply sufficient to give a character to The Physical Atlas.

The new edition includes many new maps, and is enriched by the contributions of the greatest living scientific men, by whose researches the domain of Physical Geography has been extended, including Sir R. Murchison, Prof. E. Forbes, Col. Sabine, Sir David Brewster, &c. A new and complete Geographical Map of the United States and British North America, compiled from the latest data, by Prof. Rogers, (of Boston,) with descriptive Illustrated Notes, is for the first time given, with much other matter relating to this Continent.

This is the only collection of Maps of those countries from documents not yet pub. (1857) in Europe or America.

"The Gazetteer which bears his name is remarkable for its completeness; and his Atlas of the United States of America supplies a deficiency which has long been felt on both sides of the Atlantic."—Edin. Rev., April, 1857, n.

No library of any kind, public or private, clerical or lay, school or family, should be without the invaluable publications of Mr. Alexander Keith Johnston.

Johnston, Andrew. Notitia Anglicana; shewing, 1. The Achievements of all the English Nobility, &c., complete, Lon., 1724, 2 vols. 8vo. See Moule's Bibl. Herald., 318.

Johnston, Arthur, M.D., 1587-1641, a native of Cassieben, near Aberdeen, took his medical degree at Padua in 1610, resided abroad about twenty-four years, of which twenty were spent in France, returned home about 1632, and died at Oxford. He was one of the best Latin scholars of his age, and pub. several works in that language. An edit. of his works was pub., Middleb., in 1641. Of these the best-known is his Latin version of the Psalms of David, —Psalmorum Davidis Paraphrasis Poetica, et Canticoorum Evangelicorum, Aberd., 1637, 12mo. Often reprinted. There formerly existed an animated dispute (already referred to by us in our life of George Buchanan) relative to the respective merits of Johnston's and Buchanan's versions of the Psalms. We give the opinions of several eminent critics:

"A sort of critical controversy was carried on in the last century, as to the versions of the Psalms by Buchanan and Johnston. Though the national honour may seem equally secure by the superiority of either, it has, I believe, been usual in Scotland to maintain the older poet against all the world. I am nevertheless inclined to think that Johnston's Psalms, all of which are in elegiac metre, do not fall far short of those of Buchanan either in elegance of style or in correctness of Latinity. In the 137th, with which Buchanan has taken much pains, he may be allowed the preference, but not at a great interval, and he has attained his superiority by too much diffusiveness."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1844, iii. 53.

"Arthur Johnston is not so verbose, and has, of course, more vigour; but his choice of a couplet, which keeps the reader always in mind of the puerile epistles of Ovid, was singularly injudicious."—Dr. Beattie: Dissertations Moral and Critical.

We may remark, with reference to Beattie's mention of Ovid, that Buchanan was formerly called the Scottish Virgil, and Johnston the Scottish Ovid.

"He [Johnston] has many beautiful and even powerful lines, such as can scarce be matched by his more popular competitor; the style of Johnston possessing somewhat of Ovidian ease, accompanied with strength and simplicity, while the tragic pomp and worldly parade of Seneca and Prudentius are more affected by Buchanan."—Prof. Wm. Tennant: Edin. Lit. Jour., iii. 289.

Auditor Benson pub. an ed. of Johnston's Version in 1740, 4to, 8vo, and 12mo; a Prefatory Discourse to it, 1740, 8vo; a Conclusion to the Discourse in 1741, and a Supplement to it in the same year. In the last he instituted a Comparison between Johnston and Buchanan, and gives the preference to the former; but this opinion was controverted by George Ruddiman in A Vindication of Buchanan's Paraphrase, pub. in 1745, 8vo. See BENSON, WILLIAM. Lord Woodhouselee prefers Buchanan's version taken as a whole, but considers that Johnston has surpassed the former in some of the Psalms, for instance, 24th, 30th, 74th, 81st, 83d, 102d, and, above all, the 137th. See Mr. Hallam's remark just quoted respecting the 137th Psalm, Johnston's version.

Morhof commends Johnston's version in high terms: "Arturus Johnstonus, in Psalmorum Versione, quoadmodum et in operibus ceteris, ubique purus et tectus est, at ego quidem nihil in illo desiderare possum."

Dr. Harwood gives us little information when he informs us that Johnston was "one of the most eloquent Latin poets." Johnston pub. in 1637, Amst., 2 vols. 12mo, a work which has reflected great honour upon the Scottish nation, viz.: Delicis Postarum Soticoorum hujus ævi illustrium, to which he was a large contributor:

"We find about an equal produce of each century, the whole number being thirty-seven. Those of Johnston himself, and some elegies by Scott of Scotstave, are among the best. The Scots certainly wrote Latin with a good ear and considerable elegance of phrase."—HALLAM: ubi supra.
 "Would have done honour to any country."—DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON: Jour. to the West. Islands.

Johnston also pub. Elegia in Obitum R. Jacobi, Lon., 1635, 4to; Epigrammata, Aberd., 1632, 8vo; Parerga, 1632, 8vo; trans. of Solomon's Song into Latin Elegiac Verse, Lon., 1633, 8vo; Muse Aulicæ, 1635, 8vo. His translations into Latin of the Te Deum, Creed, Decalogue, &c. were subjoined to his Psalma. Mrs. J. edited for a number of years a monthly magazine established at Edinburgh about 1830, to which she was a contributor, and she edited and contributed to the Edinburgh Tales, a weekly issue of stories and novelettes. These papers were bound up and sold together (1845-46) in 3 vols. r. 8vo, and a new ed., 3 vols. r. 8vo, bound in 1 vol., was pub. in 1850. The contributors to this agreeable collection were Mrs. Johnstone, Mrs. Marsh, M. Fraser Tytler, Mrs. Gore, Mrs. Crowe, John Mills, Miss Mitford, Mary Howitt, William Howitt, Thomas Carlyle, Sir T. Dick Lauder, &c. Mrs. Johnstone's Tales are, The Experiences of Richard Taylor; Young Mrs. Roberts's Three Christmas Dinners; Mary Anne's Hair; Governor Fox; Little Fanny Bethel; Frankland the Barrister; Mrs. Mark Lake, or West-Country Exclusives; Violet Hamilton, or The Talented Family; Mothering Sunday, or Old Usages; Andrew Howie, the Hand-loom Weaver; The Ventilator of the Old House of Commons; Blanche Delamere; The Weird of the Winrams, a Tale of the Persecuting Times; Nighean Ceard, or the Tinker's Daughter.

Mrs. Johnstone's stories have acquired great popularity.

"This work is very valuable; it abounds with ingenious remarks and displays the critical acumen of the author."—Dr. HAYDON.

"He successfully proved that our present Greek copies of that Gospel are in the same order in which they were originally written by that evangelist."—Horne's Bib. Ess.

This work is included in the following: 2. A New and Full Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament, Lon., 1726, 2 vols. 8vo; vol. iii., 1737, 8vo; Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1798, 3 vols. 8vo; 1837, 3 vols. 8vo.

"Both these works, particularly the last, are very valuable. Jones examines all the eminent testimonies respecting the canon of the New Testament. He collects all the apocryphal books which have been thought canonical, and gives an English translation of them, and refutes their pretensions in a very able manner. It is acknowledged by all parties to be a book of authority."—Orin's Bib. Ess.

"Mr. Jones has brought together, with uncommon diligence, the external evidence of the authenticity and genuineness of the canonical books, and has, with equal ability and fairness, stated his reasons for deciding against the authority of the apocryphal."—Mellish's Illustrations of the Truth of the Christian Religion.

"Mr. Jones has given us a complete enumeration of all the apocryphal books of the New Testament, and made a critical inquiry into each of these books, with an English version of those of them which are now extant, and a particular proof that none of them were ever admitted into the Canon; and he hath distinctly produced and considered every testimony relating to them that is to be found in any Christian writer or writers of the first four centuries after Christ."—Leland's View of Deistical Writers.

"The best English work on the Canon of the New Testament."—BICKERSTAFF.

Jones, William, 1680-1749, a very eminent mathematician, the friend of Sir Isaac Newton, Halley, and Mead, the tutor of Lords Hardwicke and Mansfield, and—still greater distinction—the father of Sir William Jones, was a native of the island of Anglesey, North Wales, and a mathematical teacher in London. 1. A New Compendium of the Whole Art of Navigation, Lon., 1703, 8vo. 2. Synopsis Palmariorum Matheseos; or, A New Introduction to the Mathematics, 1746, 8vo. "This work is well worthy of attentive perusal."—Dr. F. Young.

Mr. Jones also contributed several mathemat. papers to Phil. Trans., pub. a number of Sir Isaac Newton's papers (that might otherwise have been lost) under the title of Analysis per Quantitatum Series Fluxiones, ac Differentias; cum Enumerationem Linearum Tertii Ordinis, 1711, 4to; and, at the time of his death, had ready for the press an Introduction to the Mathematics,—more comprehensive than his Synopsis,—which was confided to Lord Maccolesfield for publication, and was neglected or lost. To this gentleman Mr. Jones devised his mathematical library, which was said to be the best in England. The work unfortunately lost or destroyed was intended to serve as an introduction to the mathematical and philosophical works of Sir Isaac Newton. Jones, William, of Nayland, 1726-1800, a native of Northamptonshire, was educated at the Charter House and at University College, Oxford; Vicar of Bethereden, Kent, 1764; subsequently Rector of Pluckley, (which he exchanged for Paston); Perpetual Curate of Nayland, and, in 1798, Rector of Hollingbourn. "Jones of Nayland," or "Trinity Jones," as he is sometimes called, was eminent for learning, piety, and zeal, and his knowledge of music, of which he was an excellent composer. As a theologian, he belonged to the Hutchinsonian school, and was the means of converting his friend Bishop Horne to the same creed. He has the credit of having originated The British Critic. A collective ed. of his Theological, Philosophical, and Miscellaneous Works, with his Life, by Wm. Stevens, was pub. in 1801, 12 vols. 8vo; Theological and Miscellaneous Works, republ., with Life, by Wm. Stevens, 1810, 6 vols. 8vo; a vol. of his Serms., Practical, Doctrinal, and Explanatory, was pub. in 1820, 8vo; two posthumous vols. (8vo) of Serms. on various subjects and occasions, now first pub. from the original MSS., edited by the Rev. Henry Walker, appeared in 1830. There have been recent eds. of several of his works. A Life of Jones of Nayland was pub. in 1849, sp. 8vo. Among the best-known of his publications are: 1. Answer to Bishop Clayton's Essay on Spirit, 1753: see CLAYTON, ROBERT. 2. The Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity Proved, &c., 1756. He subsequently published several other treatises in defence of the doctrine of the Trinity.

"Valuable and pious Lectures [on the Figurative Language of Scripture]."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

"These Lectures constitute, in our opinion, one of the most ingenious and valuable Works of their Author: they are at once calculated to illustrate and enforce scriptural truths, to throw new light upon some doubtful passages, to enlarge the understanding, to affect the heart and conscience, and stimulate to upright and holy conduct."—*Edinb. 6. The Scholar armed against the Errors of the Time, 1792, 2 vols. 8vo. These vols. are composed of a number of dissertations, extracts, &c. collected by Mr. Jones and pub. in this shape.

"These two volumes may be considered as a library in themselves to any young student of the Church of England, and no such person who takes a fancy to what he there finds can ever fall into Socinianism, Fanaticism, Popery, or any of those other modern corruptions which infect this Church and nation."—Jones's Life of Bishop Horne.

We have spoken of Mr. Jones as a proficient in music: he pub. several treatises on this subject, and his own anthems, in score, &c., were greatly admired. See his Life by Wm. Stevens, first printed in the Anti-Jacobin Review, and subsequently prefixed to his works, (supra.)

"A clear, able, and pious writer, though prejudiced against Calvinism."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"This eminent Hutchinsonian was the personal friend of Parkhurst and of Bishop Horne; and in talents and learning was at least equal to either of them. . . . He was a good man, an honest patriot, an unbending Churchman, and a valuable writer; but he sometimes suffered his imagination and love of allegory to overcome his better judgment."—Williams's C. P.

"One of the greatest philosophers and most devout Christians that the history of our church can boast of."—Stow's Annals of the City of London.

"Of this habited servant of God I can speak both from personal knowledge and from his writings. He was a man of quick penetration, of extensive learning, and the constant piety, and he had beyond any other man I ever knew, the talent of writing upon the deepest subjects to the plainest understanding."—Stow's Annals.

Jones, Sir William, Sept. 25, 1740–April 24, 1784, one of the most illustrious characters on the page of history, was a native of London, and a son of the eminent mathematician of the same name whose remarkable attainments in his favourite science we have already commemorated. The learning of the family was not confined to either of these persons, for the mother of Sir William was also noted for her erudition, as well as for the virtues and accomplishments more usual to her sex. That the successful pursuit of knowledge detracted nothing from the latter more valuable recommendations, we have the unequivocal testimony of her husband:

"She was virtuous without dissimulation, generous without ostentation, frugal but not niggard, cheerful but not glibly; close but not sullen, ingenious but not cunning, of spirit but not passionate, of her company constant, in her friendship true, in her private conduct, and in her husband ever faithful, loving, and obedient."

Thus did this excellent woman—as evinced in the lines just quoted, and in her future happy experiences—secure the reward promised by inspiration and recorded by the wisest of men:—"Her children rise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her." It was to the sole charge of such a mother that William Jones was left, by the decease of his father, when he had scarcely reached his third year. He early manifested an ardent thirst for knowledge, which his maternal instructor well knew how to turn to use, having formed a plan for the "Seven great exercises, that she or great principle of education was not to fail to be knowledge." Readily replied to her filial pupil. And it that to this maxim, which was inculcated for his future study. Character, ed. Lon. 1844, 641.

In seventh year, he was placed at Harrow School, under the tuition of Dr. Theobald; and this rigid preceptor, as occasional of his commendations in the presence of his best pupils, did not hesitate to declare in private that William Jones

"Was a boy of so active a mind, that, if he were left unaided and free to roam on solitary Plains, he would nevertheless find the road to fame and virtue."

This eulogium was endorsed by Dr. Sumner, Theobald's successor in 1761, so that when Jones was entered of University College, Oxford, in the spring of 1764, great expectations were reasonably entertained of his future distinction. His fond mother would not consent to a separation, which would have been equally distressing to the object of her devoted attachment, and, to the great joy of William, now in his eighteenth year, she accompanied him to Oxford. During his short residence at this famous seat of learning—to which he brought the more learning than the majority of graduates carry from it—he applied himself so assiduously to his studies, that his health would probably have been undermined for life, had he not taken care to vary the evolution of the closet with the athletic exercises in which he was a distinguished proficient. In these amusements, whilst yet at Harrow,—which Jones also pressed into the service of classic learning by giving them a dramatic character—his principal associates were William Bunsen, afterward Bishop of Cloyne, and Samuel Parr, the equally famous "Birmingham Doctor." The fame of young Jones's erudition having reached the ears of Earl Spencer, he sent him an invitation to become an inmate of his family in the capacity of tutor to Lord Althorpe, then seven years of age. This proposal was accepted, and in the summer of 1765 he removed to Wimbledon Park, where he found himself most pleasantly situated in the midst of kind friends, and with ample opportunities of pursuing his favourite researches into Oriental literature. A Fellowship at Oxford conferred upon him in the course of the following summer was an agreeable addition to the substantial comforts which now rewarded the studies for which he had been distinguished from his earliest years. In 1767, and again in 1770, he visited the Continent with the Spencer family, and whilst there eagerly availed himself of the literary opportunities which the absence of engaging occupations now permitted him freely to enjoy. On his return to England, he determined to embrace the profession of the law; and we find him on the 19th of September, 1770, duly recorded as a student of the Temple, where he soon evinced the same thirst for the acquisition of legal knowledge which previously stimulated his philological and other less abstruse investigations. He was admitted to the Bar in 1774, and appointed a Commissioner of Bankrupts in 1778. As early as 1769 he had gained great reputation by a translation, made at the request of the King of Denmark, of the Life of Noddy Shah, from an Eastern MS. into the Polish language. This, together with Pleasures relative to the French translation, &c., was pub. in 1778, London, 3 vols. 4to. Dissertation on the Littérature Orientale was pub. in 1771, 8vo, and in the same year appeared his Grammar of the Persian Language, 4to. The 7th ed. was pub. 1809, 4to, and in this ed. (and in that pub. in 1804, also edited by Dr. Charles Wilkins) the orthography is adapted to the mode of spelling adopted by Dr. Wilkins in his improved ed. of Richardson's Persian Dictionary. The Grammar will be found in vol. v of the 8vo ed. of Jones's Works, (18 vols.) but the last and best eds. are those by Professor Samuel Lee, of Cambridge, 1823, 4to, and 1828, 4to. In 1772, 8vo, (3d ed. 1777, 8vo,) he gave to the world Poems, consisting chiefly of Translations from the Asiatic Languages; in 1774, 8vo, Poems Asiaticum, &c., or, Commentaries (in Latin) on the Asiatic Poetry; and in 1778, 4to, a treatise, with Notes, of the Speeches of Imam from the Greek.

"It is almost impossible to overstate the excellence of this English performance."—Dr. Adam Clarke.

The last work was followed by a Latin Ode to Liberty, to which succeeded—the proximity is somewhat amusing—a matter-of-fact Inquiry into the Legal mode of suppressing Blisters. In the next year—1781, 8vo—appeared his learned Essay on the Law of Bailments, which is now more valued as a literary than as a legal production, and which—perhaps even an American and a layman may be permitted to remark—is far inferior to Judge Story's great work on the same subject. Jones's Essay, however, is not to be denied considerable merit; and Judge Story wrote under a better comprehension of the subject as a branch of the Common Law than was attainable in the days of his predecessor. The 2d ed. of Jones's Essay, edited by John Balmanno, was pub. in 1796, the 3d, by J. Nichol, in 1828; the 4th, by W. Theobald, in 1834. The Amer. eds. are, the reprint of the 3d English ed., Dublin, 1813, 12mo; of the 3d English ed., with addnl. Notes and References, by W. Halstead, N. York, 1838, 8vo, and an ed. pub. in Phila., 1834, 8vo. See 23 Lon. Monthly Rev., 234; Levi, 390; 3 Amer. Jar., 78; vii, 127; 8 N. Amer. Rev., 46; (by Judge Joseph Story); 23 Levi, 406; (by Dr. Chas. Follen); Bridge, Jud., 176; 7 Leg. Obs., 117; Martin's Leg. Bibl., 429; Story's Manual, Writings, 88, 74, 304, 239. We know of nothing that we can quote in this connexion so much to our purpose, so strictly pertinent, as the glowing tribute of Mr. Justice Story to the merits of his illustrious brother of the law:

"The doctrine of bailments (which lies at the foundation of the law of abatement) was almost struck out at a single hand by Lord Holt. (Note. The man of Cragg v. Barnard, 2 Ld. Raym. 2 180.) who had the good sense to incorporate into the English code that system which the text and the commentators of the civil law had already built up as the foundation of Europe. What remained to give perfect symmetry and coherence to all the parts of that system, and to refer it to its principles, has been accomplished in our time by the immortal Essay of Sir William Jones, a man of whom it is difficult to say which is most worthy of admiration, the splendour of his genius, the richness and extent of his acquirements, or the unspotted purity of his life. Had he never written any thing but his Essay on Bailments, he would have left a name unparalleled in the annals of the philosophical anatomy, of exact learning, and of subtle analysis. Even mind and nature as in the habit, if not the structure, of a professional mind, it is impossible to suppose enthusiasm when we contemplate such a man."—North American Review, vi. 68-69, Nov. 1827, and in Story's Manual, Writings, 1834, 31-32.

In March, 1783, Mr. Jones was appointed a Judge of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Fort William, and received the honour of knighthood, and about the same time—a happiness which perhaps he valued more than either of the instances of good fortune just named—he was married to Anna Maria Shipley, eldest daughter of the Bishop of St. Asaph. His friends were rejoiced to see his eminent merit not unmitigatedly rewarded, and Lord Ashburton congratulated him on having at once secured "two of the first objects of human pursuit,—those of ambition and love."

In April, 1783, Sir William Jones and his lady embarked for India, and arrived at Calcutta in the month of September. That ardour in the pursuit of knowledge which was one of his most distinguishing characteristics was not allowed to slumber in his adopted home. He called around him those who were likely to sympathize with his interest in the cause of learning, and in nine months after his arrival had the satisfaction of establishing a society, the "Transactions" of which have added greatly to our knowledge of Asiatic literature and science. Before his departure he had exhibited his knowledge of an abstruse department of Oriental literature by his translations into English of an Arabian poem on the Mohammedan Law of Succession to the Property of Intestates, (1782, 4to,) and of The Moallakat, or Seven Ancient Arabian Poems, (1783, 4to;) and he now determined to qualify himself, by acquiring a knowledge of the Sanskrit, for the preparation of a digest of Hindu and Mohammedan Laws, similar to that which Justinian gave to his Greek and Roman subjects. The year 1789 was made memorable in Anglo-India literary annals by the publication of the first volume of the Asiatic Researches, and the completion of Sir William Jones's translation of Sacontala, or The Fatal Ring, [Sakontala; or, The Lost Ring?] an ancient Indian drama by Kildāsa. This was not pub., however, until the appearance of the collective ed. of Sir William's Works, in 1799, 6 vols. 4to. In 1794, 8vo, (2d ed., 1797, 8vo,) he pub., as an institute prefatory to his larger work, a trans. of the Ordinances of Menu, "who is esteemed by the Hindus the first of created beings, and not only the oldest, but the holiest, of legislators." Sir William had intended in the following year (1795) to follow Lady Jones, who had been compelled by ill-health to return to England in 1793; but it was not so written. On the evening of the 20th of April, or about that date, exposure to the night-air during a protracted ramble brought on an inflammation of the liver, which resulted fatally within a week. Thus died, far away from home, and separated from her whose presence could best have soothed the pangs of a dying hour, this illustrious Englishman, ere he had numbered forty-eight years, during one-fourth of which he had enjoyed a reputation for scholarship unequalled by any one living. But he was not alone: his excellent friend Lord Teignmouth closed his eyes in death, and the God whom he had long served in fervency of faith and humility of spirit did not forget him in the time of weakness and the hour of trial:

"His bodily suffering," says his lordship, "from the complacency of his features and the ease of his attitude, could not have been severe; and his mind must have derived consolation from those sources where he had been in the habit of seeking it, and where alone, in our last moments, it can ever be found."

His remains were interred in the burial-ground at Calcutta; but a stately monument to his memory arrests the thoughtful attention of the visitor to St. Paul's Cathedral.

The testimony of Sir William Jones to the authenticity and inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, and the weight and value of the sanctions and the consolations by which they appeal to the mind and heart of man, is of peculiar value. Profoundly versed in the languages in which they were originally written, and skilled to a surprising extent in the peculiarities of Oriental literature,—starting moreover, when a young man, with a skeptical bias against the claims of revelation,—the conclusion to which his mind was brought by his researches is thus told in his own words:

"I have regularly and attentively read the Holy Scriptures, and am of opinion that this volume, independent of its divine origin, contains more sublimity and beauty, more pure morality, more important history, and finer strains of poetry and eloquence, than can be collected from all other books, in whatever language or age they may have been composed."

This will remind the reader very forcibly of the remark of the illustrious friend of Sir William Jones's father, Sir Isaac Newton:

"I find more sure marks of the authenticity of the Bible than in any profane history whatever."

With us, we confess, such evidence is irresistible; and certain it is that if the testimony of these great men, or of either of them, had leaned to the other side of the question, we should never have heard the last of it from unbelievers.

A collective ed. of the works of this eminent scholar was pub. by his friend Lord Teignmouth, in 1799, in 6 vols. 4to; to these were added two supplementary volumes, in 1801, and a Life by Lord Teignmouth in 1804; in all, 9 vols. 4to. The whole were reprinted in 1807, in 13 vols. 8vo, with the exception of the supplementary volumes, the contents of which were not written by Sir William, but consist of a reprint of such parts of the vols. of the Asiatic Researches pub. under his presidency as had not been inserted among his works. The contents of the 13 vols. of which Sir William Jones's works consist are as follows: I. II. Memoirs of the Author, by Lord Teignmouth. III. Lord Teignmouth's Discourse at a Meeting of the Asiatic Society, [on the decease of Sir William Jones;] Anniversary Discourses (XI.) before the Asiatic Society, 1784-94. On the Hindus, the Arabs, the Tartars, the Persians, the Chinese, the Borderers, &c. of Asia; the origin and families of nations, Asiatic history, and the philosophy of the Asiatics. Extracts from the last book of the Ramayan. Extracts from the Vedas. Fragments. Catalogue of Oriental MSS. presented to the Royal Society.

The above list of writings, especially when considered in connexion with the multiplied personal engagements of the author, certainly exhibits evidence of no ordinary literary industry. The admiration of the reader will be increased by an inspection of a table of the languages with which this eminent linguist was more or less familiar. 1. Greek. 2. Latin. 3. Italian. 4. French. 5. But Sir William's circle of attainments was by no means limited to a knowledge of languages, or to the various subjects upon which he employed his fertile pen, as indicated in the preceding catalogue of his productions: in chemistry, mathematics, botany, and music, he was also deeply versed.

"He seems," says Lord Teignmouth, "to have acted on this maxim:—that whatever had been attained was attainable by him; and he was never observed to overlook or to neglect any opportunity of adding to his accomplishments or to his knowledge. When in India, his studies began with the dawn, and, in seasons of intermission from professional duty, continued throughout the day: meditation retraced and confirmed what reading had collected or investigation discovered. By a regular application of time to particular occupations, he pursued various objects without confusion; and, in undertakings which depended on his individual perseverance, he was never deterred by difficulties from proceeding to a successful termination."—Life of Sir William Jones.

The great success with which he pursued his investigations into the literature of the East has elicited the admiration of all who have carried the spirit of inquiry into the same department:

"There are few authors to whom Oriental literature is under more deep obligations than to Sir William Jones; few who, like him, have not merely pointed out original and important sources of knowledge, but contributed in no inconsiderable degree to render them accessible. He was equally remarkable for his arduous and industry in philological pursuits, from a very early period of his life, until its premature and lamented close."—WILKES: Origin of the English Language.

"William Jones has as yet had no rivals in the department which he selected; no one appears to have comprehended as he did the antiquities of Asia, and, above all, of India, with the acuteness of a philosopher, or to have seen the mode of reconciling every thing with the doctrine and history of the Scriptures."—FRANKLIN: Von Schlegel: Lects. on the Hist. of Literature, Ancient and Modern; Lect. XIV.

And see Lect. V., where several of Sir William's translations are briefly noticed.

It is to be remembered that Schlegel penned the passages just quoted almost half a century since,—in 1812. Since that date Oriental literature has been cultivated with great success by Horace Hayman Wilson, Duncan Forbes, Monier Williams, J. Cockburn Thomson, Eastwick, Cowell, Cassal, Griffith, Barker, Keene, Johnson, Prinsep, and others. Among the modern specimens of translations from the Sanskrit, we may briefly notice that of the Bhagavad-Gītā, by J. C. Thomson, and the version of Sakontalā, or The Lost Ring, by M. Williams. The prose translations of these works—that of the former by Sir Charles Wilkins, of the latter by Sir William Jones—had made them known to Oriental scholars, but in the new versions recently published (1855) they are likely to have a much wider circulation. Sakontalā, or The Lost Ring, has elicited ardent eulogies from those who have taken the pains to acquaint themselves with its many beauties:

"The only specimen of their plays (nastaka) hitherto known to us is the delightful Sakontalā, which, notwithstanding the foreign colouring of the native climate, bears in its general structure such a striking resemblance to our own romantic drama, that we might be inclined to suspect we owe this resemblance to the predilection for Shakespeare entertained by the English translator, (Sir William Jones). If his fidelity were not attested by other learned Orientalists."—AUGUSTUS WILLIAM VON SCHLEGEL: Lect. on Dramat. Art and Lit., 1806; Lect. II.

"Of all Indian poems, so far as we are as yet acquainted with them, that of Sakuntalā (which has been translated with the most scrupulous exactness by Jones) is the work which gives the best idea of Indian poetry: it is a speaking example of that sort of beauty which is peculiar to the spirit of their fictions."—FREDERICK VON SCHLEGEL: Lect. on the Hist. of Lit., 1812; Lect. V.

"Kālidāsa, the celebrated author of Sakontalā, is a masterly describer of the influence which nature exercises upon the minds of lovers. This great poet flourished at the Court of Vikramaditya, and was therefore contemporary with Virgil and Horace. Tenderness in the expression of feeling, and richness of creative fancy, have assigned to him his lofty place among the poets of all nations."—ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT.

But the glowing eulogy of Goethe must not be omitted: "Wouldst thou the young year's blossoms and the fruits of its decline,

And all by which the soul is charm'd, enraptured, feasted, fed!
Wouldst thou the earth and heaven itself in one sole name combine!
I name thee, O Sakontalā! and all at once is said."

Mr. Williams's translation is a free one, and in prose and verse, and a great improvement (according to Professor H. H. Wilson) upon the original translation by Sir William Jones. Whilst noticing modern translations of this school, we must not omit to make honourable mention of the following:

Khīrad-Afros, Anvar-i Suhaili, Gulistān, Bāgh o Bahār, and Prem Sāgar, by Prof. E. B. Eastwick; a selection from the Odes of Hāsi, and Vikramorvāsi, by Prof. E. B. Cowell; the Anekārtha of Hemachandra, by Charles Cassal; Baitāl Pachisi, by Prof. W. B. Barker; Akhlāk-i Muhsini, by Prof. H. G. Keene; and Hitopadēsa, by Prof. Johnson.

We observe that a prize of £300 has been recently offered, (March, 1857,) by a gentleman lately a member of the Bengal Civil Service, for the best treatise on the Vedānta. The treatise is to be written in German or French. The essays are to be lodged with the Royal Asiatic Society before April 1, 1860, and Professor Lassen, of Bonn, Dr. Windischmann, of Munich, and Professor Max Müller, of Oxford, are to be the examiners and adjudicators. The object is to elicit treatises which will be of assistance to Christian missionaries in the East. Some years ago, the same gentleman who offers this prize placed two sums of £500 at the disposal of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, for essays on Christianity and Hinduism.

But we have wandered from our theme, and the length of our article warns us to return. It may be readily supposed that the melancholy news of the early demise of the profound scholar, the upright judge, the conscientious Christian, and the affectionate friend, elicited many tears not only in the land where he had been known from boyhood, but also in his adopted home, among a simple and confiding people, who had suffered too much from the cruelty and extortion of many of his countrymen not to know how to value a man of such true nobility of character as Sir William Jones:

"The pundits who were in the habit of attending him," remarks his friend and biographer, "when I saw them at a public durbar a few days after that melancholy event, could neither restrain their tears for his loss, nor find terms to express their admiration at the wonderful progress which he had made in the sciences which they professed."—LOAN TREKHOVSKY: Life of Sir William Jones.

The commendations of his countrymen have been lavished upon his character and attainments with all the profusion of eloquence animated by the warmth of affection, and yet have not exceeded the rigid estimate of impartial criticism.

"Know him, sir!" exclaimed the friend of his boyhood, Samuel Parr,—who, with all his pompous affectation, had a warm heart under his Roman mail,—"Know him, sir! who did not know him? Who did not bend in devout respect at the variety and depth of his learning, the integrity of his principles, and the benevolence of his heart?"—BARKER'S Patriarchs, 222.

"Need I dwell a moment," says Dr. Dibdin, "on the recommendation of the works of Sir William Jones? A scholar, a critic, philosopher, lawyer, and poet,—where shall we find, in the works of the same man, greater demonstrations of pure and correct feeling, and cultivated and classical taste, than in the volumes here noticed and recommended? The piety of Sir William Jones was not inferior to his learning. A thoroughly good and great-minded man, his caution, humility, and diffidence were equal to his learning and multifarious attainments; and there is a vigour and raciness in his translations of Persian poetry which give them the enchanting air of original productions."—Lit. Comp., ed. 1826, 426.

"His writings everywhere breathe pure taste in morals as well as in literature; and it may be said with truth, that not a single sentiment has escaped him which does not indicate the real elegance and dignity which pervaded the most secret recesses of his mind. No author is better calculated to inspire those generous sentiments of liberty without which the most just principles are useless and lifeless."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

"The name of Sir William Jones is associated not only with the splendour of a great reputation, but with almost all the amiable and exemplary virtues; and the tender affections, which were a little chilled by the aspect of his vast literary attainments, are won sweetly back, and rest with delight upon the view which is here exhibited [in Lord Teignmouth's Life of Sir William Jones] of the purity, the integrity, and the mildness of his private manners. . . . The most remarkable features of his character, indeed, seem to have resulted from the union of this gentleness and modesty of disposition with a very lofty conception of his own capability and destination."—LOAN JEFFREY: Review of Lord Teignmouth's Life of Sir Wm. Jones, Edin. Rev., v. 322-330, Jan. 1805.

"In the course of a short life, Sir William Jones acquired a degree of knowledge which the ordinary faculties of men, if they were blessed with antediluvian longevity, could scarcely hope to surpass. His learning threw light on the laws of Greece and India, on the general literature of Asia, and on the history of the family of nations. He carried philosophy, eloquence, and philanthropy into the character of a lawyer and a judge. Amidst the driest toils of erudition, he retained a sensibility to the beauties of poetry, and a talent for transmuting them into his own language, which has seldom been united with the same degree of industry. When he went abroad, it was not to enrich himself with the spoils of avarice or ambition, but to search, amidst the ruins of Oriental literature, for treasures which he would not have exchanged

'For all Boccaccio's vaunted gold,
Or all the gems of Samarcand.'"

THOMAS CAMPBELL.

But Lord Jeffrey takes a view of this subject less discouraging to the young student, and tells us that,

"Great as Sir William Jones's attainments unquestionably were, they may be contemplated without despair by any one who is not frightened by his industry." Nor is his lordship disposed to concede to Sir William Jones's mind the attributes of original genius, philosophical acumen, or great strength of understanding. A similar opinion to this was expressed in very decided terms by one who, as we have just seen, entertained the highest admiration for Sir William's character,—Sir James Mackintosh. But the time for quotation is passed, and the curious reader can pursue this matter further by referring to the Edinburgh Review for January, 1805,—Lord Jeffrey's Review of Lord Teignmouth's Life of Sir William Jones; and to the North American Review for October, 1832,—Alexander H. Jones, William Alfred, b. June 26, 1817, in the city of New York, is the son of the late Hon. David S. Jones, and a member of a family which has long been eminent in the annals of jurisprudence. The subject of our notice graduated at Columbia College, New York, and has been for some years officiating in the capacity of librarian to that institution. 1. The Analyst: a Collection of Miscellaneous Papers, New York, 1849, 18mo.

"This is a volume well worthy to be read. It gives proof of reflection, observation, and literary culture; and its style is always clear, sometimes forcible and terse, though not often elegant. It abounds with shrewd remarks, happy criticisms, and well-drawn traits of character. But it is not executed with equal felicity throughout. The author imitates largely in some parts of his book; he writes not from his own mind and after his own fashion, but draws from others both matter and form."—*N. Amer. Mr. Jones has been long known as a critic, and his uncollected essays, contributed to the New York Church Record, Arcturus, Whig Review, Democratic Review, &c., would fill two vols. of the size of those which he has given to the world. A highly-favourable opinion of Mr. Jones's critical abilities will be found in Edgar A. Poe's Literati, in the paper entitled R. P. Whipple and other Critics.

Jones, William T. Catholic Rights, 1792, 8vo.

Jonson, Ben, or, more correctly, Benjamin Jonson, 1573-1637, one of the most eminent of English dramatists, was a native of Westminster, and came into the world a month after the decease of his father,—who, after suffering imprisonment and confiscation of estates for his Protestant principles, became a preacher of those doctrines for which he had been in bonds. It has been generally asserted by the poet's biographers, from the time of Wood to Gifford, that his mother, after the decease of Jonson's father, married again, and that the object of her choice was a bricklayer, named Thomas Fowler. But the later researches of Mr. Peter Cunningham, endorsed by the learned imprimatur of Mr. J. Payne Collier, have brought us to the conclusion, to borrow the language of the last-named gentleman, that, "if Ben Jonson's mother married a second time, we have yet to ascertain who was her second husband." That the future poet, however, did in his early youth give some reluctant attention to the useful art and mystery of brickmaking, we have his own avowal, conveyed in most disgusting terms. Previously to this unpromising entrance upon the responsibilities of active life, Jonson had pursued his studies at the school attached to St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, at Westminster School, (under the illustrious Camden,) and for a week or month, when in his sixteenth year, at St. John's College, Cambridge. After throwing aside his trowel, the mechanic turned soldier, and gained great distinction by his bravery while serving in a campaign in the Low Countries. There is a tradition that on his return to England at the age of nineteen he returned to pursue his studies at Cambridge; but this conjecture appears to have no better foundation than the difficulty of otherwise accounting for that proficiency which he undoubtedly acquired in some of the Latin authors. It appears much more likely that he immediately became connected with the stage,—where he had but little success as an actor,—and not long after applied his literary talent to good purpose by assisting the dramatists of the day in the composition of their pieces. An unfortunate quarrel with a brother-actor, named Gabriel Spencer, led to a duel which resulted in the death of the latter and the imprisonment, for about a twelvemonth, of the unhappy victor. Whilst in prison, he was visited by a Roman Catholic priest, who presented his doctrines in so favourable a light to the repentant duellist that he became a convert, and for twelve years retained the ecclesiastical connexion thus commenced. The young actor was no sooner discharged from custody than he sought to resign his freedom, and, perhaps without a due appreciation of the serious step he was taking, was not satisfied until able to write himself a married man. The hardships of poverty pressed sorely upon the young couple, whose sole fortune consisted in their abundant stock of mutual affection, (we speak of the honeymoon,) and the actor determined to become an author in the enlarged sense of that term, by trying his luck with a drama, calculated, he fondly hoped, to produce a harvest of profit and reputation. The precise time at which he composed the Comedie of Every Man in his Hymn cannot now be ascertained, but it was originally acted by the Lord-Chamberlain's servants, in the form in which we have it, in the year 1598, although it is asserted that it was acted eleven times between Nov. 25, 1596, and Nov. 10, 1597. He seems to have previously written for the stage conjointly with others, as we have intimated above, and without assistance; but we are obliged to commence the list of his ascertained productions with the play just named. This at once gained him fame and enemies; and now seem to have commenced those literary quarrels the details of which form so large a portion of Jonson's personal history. Rejecting the stories of his misunderstandings with Shakespeare, who, it is asserted,—but the assertion is not believed by Gifford,—was the means of introducing his first comedy on the stage, we still leave our poet's hands full of his assailants,—Decker, Marston, Gill, and other active combatants. This successful piece was followed by Every Man out of his Hymn, A Comical Satyre, first acted in 1599; Cynthia's Revels, or The Fountayne of Selfe-Love, first acted in 1599; The Poetaster, or His Arraignement, a Comical Satyre, first acted in 1601; Saunders his Fall, a Tragedie, first acted in 1603; Volpone, or The Foxe, a Comedie, first acted in 1605; Epicoene, or The Silent Woman, Comedie, first acted in 1609; The Alchemist, a Comedie, first acted in 1610; Catiline his Conspiracy, a Tragedie, first acted in 1611. So far we have quoted the titles of our author's principal productions (not pausing to notice his minor pieces) from his own collective edit. of his Workes, pub. in 1616, now lying before us. To these succeed, in this ancient folio, Epigrammes, I. Booke; The Forrest, (Songs, Odes, &c.); Part of the King's Entertainment in passing to his Coronation; A Panegyre on The Happie Entrance of James ovr Sovereigne to His first high Session of Parliament in this his Kingdome the 19 of March, 1603; Masques at Court.

It will be seen that in this folio, pub. in 1616, the author did not include the Comedies of Bartholomew Fair, produced in 1614, and the Devil's an Ass, produced in 1616. It is probable, also, that a number of minor pieces written before this time (many are without any date) were reserved by the author for a future volume of his collected Workes:

"He seems," says Gifford, "to have meditated a complete edition of all his works; but he apparently grew weary towards the com-situation of the volume, and never (unless peculiarly called upon) had recourse to the press afterwards. The second folio is a wretched continuation of the first, printed from the MSS. surreptitiously obtained during his life, or ignorantly hurried through the press after his death. It bears a variety of dates, from 1631 to 1641 inclusive. It is probable that he looked forward to a period of retirement and ease; but the loss of his MSS. by fire, and the fatal illness which almost immediately afterwards seized him, rendered all such views abortive. It is remarkable that he calls his Epigrams 'Book the First': he had, therefore, others in his hand; but they have perished."—Memoir of Ben Jonson.

It was three years after Jonson's death before any of his later productions were published. Two small editions of his minor pieces were issued in 1640, and in the next year appeared a reprint of his own folio of 1616, and a second vol. of the same size, containing his dramatic pieces from 1612, several masques, and all that could be discovered of his occasional poetry. Another collective ed. of his Works was pub. in 1692, fol.; another (a reprint of the last) in 1715, 6 vols. 8vo; and a more complete one, edited by the Rev. Peter Whalley, in 1756, 7 vols. 8vo. A second issue of Whalley's edit. was commenced in 1792, but the publication extended no further than two numbers. In 1811, 4 vols. r. 8vo, appeared—what has been denominated "an execrable edition"—The Dramatic Works of Ben Jonson and Beaumont and Fletcher. Whalley's edit. was most carefully compiled, the text that of the impression of 1715, rarely collated with early edits., and often erroneous, and the notes of little if of any value. In 1816 Mr. William Gifford pub. the first good edit. of Jonson's Works. This was accompanied with Notes, Critical and Explanatory, and a Biographical Memoir. It was pub. in 9 vols. 8vo, £6 6s.; r. 8vo, £9. We shall have something more to say of this edit. presently. In 1838, Mr. Moxon, of London, pub. an edit. of Jonson's Works in r. 8vo, edited by Barry Cornwall, another edit. in 1841, r. 8vo, and again in 1853, r. 8vo. Mr. Moxon put forth a collective edit., prefaced in both cases with Gifford's Memoir of the Author. To this Memoir, and especially to the biography of Jonson in Austin and Ralph's Lives of the Poets Laureate, Lon., 1853, 8vo, we refer the reader for further information respecting "Rare Ben Jonson." The other accounts of the poet, referred to below, may be examined for the gratification of curiosity, and for the amusing gossip of the times to which they relate; but, according to Mr. Gifford, few men have suffered more from literary injustice than the author of Catiline and Sejanus. Mr. Gifford himself, however, is perhaps too warm a partisan to be considered an infallible authority. In Moxon's reprints of Jonson's Works, above referred to, (1841, r. 8vo; 1853, r. 8vo), the arrangement is as follows: after the eleven dramatic pieces already noticed by us, come The Staple of News, a Play; The New Inn, or The Light Heart, a comedy; The Magnetic Lady, or Humours Reconciled, a play; A Tale of a Tub, a play; (this is the last work of the author that was submitted to the stage;) The Sad Shepherd, or A Tale of Robin Hood, a play; The Case is Altered, a play; Entertainments; Masques; Epigrams; The Forest; Underwoods; Leges Convivales; Translations from the Latin Poets; Timber, or Discoveries made upon Men and Matter; The English Grammar; Jonsonus Viribus, or The Memory of Ben Jonson; Glossary; Index. Between Gifford's Memoir of the Author and the first of his pieces are inserted Ancient Commendatory Verses on Ben Jonson. We have already referred (see CHAPMAN, GEORGE) to Jonson's share in the composition of Eastward-Ho, and he was a partner in other literary enterprises,—according to the custom of the poets of the age.

It was in 1616 that Jonson received an acceptable mark of the royal favour, in the shape of an annual pension from King James of one hundred marks a year for life, (from henceforth we designate him by the title of Poet-Laureate,) which was increased by King Charles, in 1630, to one hundred pounds sterling, and "a terree of Canary Wine." This augmentation of his income (for which, indeed, he had petitioned the king in a rhyming epistle) did not come any too soon, for the extravagance of the poet between 1616 and 1625, his multiplied libations at the Mermaid, and profuse hospitality at his own table, had reduced him to great straits. It is melancholy to be obliged to add that he died in poverty: it is more pleasing to our feelings to be able to record the fact that he departed in penitence and faith,—regretting the occasional irreverence of his pen, and, we trust, deploring the frequent abuse of powers which were given for nobler ends. He was called to the "dread account" before the "Judge of all the earth" on the 6th day of August, 1637. Did our space permit, we might, ere we proceeded to a brief consideration of Jonson's characteristics as a writer, linger a short time over some of the prominent incidents of the poet's life, especially upon his memorable visit to Drummond of Hawthornden in 1619, his wit (or wet) combats with Shakespeare, and his less amiable contests with the second-rate wits of this belligerent age. But we have already referred the reader to abundant sources of information, and with them we shall leave him, after he has borne us company for a few moments longer, whilst we quote some opinions from a few eminent authorities respecting the characteristics of this once-favourite author.

"Ben Jonson, a younger contemporary and rival of Shakespeare, who laboured in the sweat of his brow, but with no great success, to expel the romantic drama from the English stage and to form it on the model of the ancients, gave it as his opinion that Shakespeare did not blot enough, and that, as he did not possess much school-learning, he owed more to nature than to art. . . . Jonson was a critical poet in the good and bad sense of the word. He endeavoured to form an exact estimate of what he had on every occasion to perform; hence he succeeded best in that species of the drama which makes the principal demand on the understanding and with little call on the imagination and feeling,—the comedy of character. He introduced nothing into his works which critical dissection should not be able to extract again, as his confidence in it was such, that he conceived it exhausted every thing which pleases and charms us in poetry. He was not aware that in the chemical retort of the critic what is most valuable, the volatile living spirit of a poem, evaporates. His pieces are in general deficient in soul, in that nameless something which never ceases to attract and enchant us even because it is indefinable. In the lyrical pieces, his Masques, we feel the want of a certain mental music of imagery and intonation, which the most accurate observation of difficult measures cannot give. He is everywhere deficient in those excellencies which, unsought, flow from the poet's pen, and which no artist who purposely hunts for them can ever hope to find. We must not quarrel with him, however, for entertaining a high opinion of his own works, since whatever merits they have been owed, like acquired moral properties, altogether to himself. The production of them was attended with labour, and unfortunately it is also a labour to read them. They resemble solid and regular edifices, before which, however, the clumsy scaffolding still remains, to interrupt and prevent us from viewing the architecture with ease and receiving from it a harmonious impression. We have of Jonson two tragical attempts, and a number of comedies and masques.

"He could have risen to the dignity of the tragic tone, but for the pathetic he had not the smallest turn. As he incessantly preaches up the imitation of the ancients, (and he had, we cannot deny, a learned acquaintance with their works,) it is astonishing to observe how much his two tragedies differ, both in substance and form, from the Greek tragedy. . . . After these attempts, Jonson took leave of the Tragic Muse, and in reality his talents were far better suited to Comedy, and that, too, merely the Comedy of Character. His characterisation, however, is more marked with serious satire than playful ridicule: the latter Roman satirists, rather than the comic authors, were his models. In so far as plot is concerned, the greatest praise is merited by Folpone, The Alchemist, and Epicures, or The Silent Woman. . . . Of all Jonson's pieces there is hardly one which, as it stands, would please on the stage in the present day, even as most of them failed to please in his own time: extracts from them, however, could hardly fail to be successful. In general, much might be borrowed from him, and much might be learned both from his merits and defects. His characters are, for the most part, solidly and judiciously drawn; what he most fails in, is the art of setting them off by the contrast of situations. The peculiarity of Jonson's Masques most deserving of remark seems to me to be the anti-masques, as they are called, which the poet himself sometimes attaches to his own invention, and generally allows to precede the serious act. As the ideal batteries, for whose sake the gods have been brought down from Olympus, are but too apt to fall into mawkishness, this antidote on such occasions is certainly deserving of commendation."—AUGUSTUS WILLIAM VON SCHLEGEL: Lects. on Dramat. Art and Lit.; Black's Trans., Lon., 1846, 3d, 4th, 462, 463, 466, 468.

Dr. Johnson is thought to have very happily hit off the character of his dramatic namesake in the following graphic lines in his celebrated prologue:

"Then Jonson came, instructed from the school,
To please by method, and invent by rule.
His studious patience and laborious art
With regular approach assayed the heart:
Cold approbation gave the ling'ring bays,
For they who durst not censure scarce could praise.
A mortal born, he met the general doom,
But left, like Egypt's kings, a lasting tomb."

Mr. Campbell will be found to dissent widely from the authorities just quoted, and from several others whose opinions we shall have occasion to cite:

"The art of Jonson was not confined to the cold observations of the unities of place and time, but appears in the whole adaptation of his incidents and characters to the support of each other. Beneath his learning and art he moves with an activity which may be compared to the strength of a man who can leap and bound under the heaviest armour."—Specimens of English Poetry.

"There are people who cannot take olives: and I cannot much relish Ben Jonson, though I have taken some pains to do it, and went to the task with every sort of good will. I do not deny his power or his merit; but from it: but it is to me a repulsive and unamiable kind. He was a great man in himself, but one cannot readily sympathize with him. His works, as the characteristic productions of an individual mind, or as records of the manners of a particular age, cannot be valued too highly; but they have little charm for the more general reader."—Hamilt's Lects. on the English Comic Writers; Lect. II.

"Ben Jonson's serious productions are, in my opinion, superior to his comic ones. What he does, is the result of strong sense and painful industry; but sense and industry agree better with the grave and severe than with the light and gay productions of the muse."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth; Lect. IV.

"If asked to give our opinion of Ben Jonson's powers in general, we should say that he was a poet of a high order, as far as learning, fancy, and an absolute rage of ambition could conspire to make him one; but that he never touched at the highest, except by violent efforts and during the greatest felicity of his sense of success. The material so predominated in him over the spiritual,—the sensual over the sentimental,—that he was more social than loving, and far more wilful and fanciful than imaginative."—Leigh Hunt's Men and Women and Books: Suckling and Ben Jonson.

"I do not think that his poetical merits are yet properly appreciated. I cannot consent that the palm of humour alone shall be given to him, while in wit, feeling, pathos, and poetical diction he is to be sunk fathoms below Fletcher and Massinger. In the last particular I think that he excels them both, and, indeed, all his contemporaries, excepting Shakespeare."—Henry Noel's Lects. on English Poetry; Lect. III.

Mr. Disraeli also comes to the rescue of the abused poet: "Some modern critics, whose delicacy of taste in its natural feebleness could not strain itself to the vigour of Jonson, have strangely failed to penetrate into the depths of that mighty mind; and some modern poets have delivered their sad evidence that for them the Corypheus of our elder dramatists has become unintelligible."—Amenities of Literature: The Humours of Jonson.

"With such extraordinary requisites for the stage, joined to a strain of poetry always manly, frequently lofty, and sometimes almost sublime, it may at first appear strange that his dramas are not more in vogue; but a little attention to his peculiar modes and habits of thinking will, perhaps, enable us in some measure to account for it. The grace and urbanity which mark his lighter pieces he laid aside whenever he approached the stage, and put on the censor with the sock. This system (whether wise or unwise) naturally led to circumstances which affect his popularity as a writer: he was obliged, as one of his critics justly observes, 'to hunt down his own characters,' and, to continue the metaphor, he was frequently carried too far in the chase."—Gifford's Memoir of Ben Jonson.

The whole of this criticism should be consulted by the reader.

"The fault in Jonson's two tragedies is that there is not enough to interest flesh and blood in them and to stir up the sympathies, the hopes and fears, of humanity. There is a cold historic sublimity, which, however it may command the homage of the intellect, awakes no responsive echo in the heart. The characters are true to history,—true, therefore, to human nature; and they move on in the plot with stern and terrible decision. But the harsh outline lacks those lighter pencillings, those softer colourings, in which poetry surpasses history, and without which the picture, though bold and masterly, will not chain the living gaze of the spectator to the painter's canvas. . . . His best comedies are so generally known that a lengthy critique on them would be tedious. Those that are less read are scarcely deserving of any notice, beyond the interest that must attach itself to any production from the pen of such a man. Every Man in his Humour, The Alchemist, Volpone, or the Fox, and The Silent Woman, are the best of the numerous comedies he has left us. . . . Jonson's masques are beautiful. Though with occasional extravagant fancies and strained conceits, they are full of learning and taste. They were many of them written for great festive occasions. . . . Some beautiful songs are introduced into them. . . . As a translator he must not be forgotten. He has left a version of Horace's Ars Poetica, and a few of the odes. The former is marvellously literal, and not so tame as might therefore be supposed. In the latter there is little to praise; but he has excelled these regular translations in passages of the masques and elsewhere, which he has borrowed from ancient authors and literally rendered. . . . Jonson is no exception to the rule that clear and strong utterance is one of the chief characteristics of genius, and that great poets have been good prose-writers. The fragment entitled Timber, or Discoveries, sufficiently shows, without appealing to his letters, dedications, and prefaces, that English literature lost much by the destruction of his prose manuscripts. The small remnant that is left is full of erudite criticism, profound reflection, and great severity of judgment. There are notes on books and on life, arranged in a strange and arbitrary manner, written in a concise and pregnant style, and, though they do not contain so much sententious wisdom, remind us forcibly of the Essays of Bacon. . . . We have spoken of Jonson as the author of tragedy, of comedy, of masque, as a translator and prose-writer. But it is as a lyric poet also that we claim for him a homage and admiration which has hitherto been sparingly given if yielded at all."—Austin and Ralph's Lives of the Poets-Laureate, Lon., 1853, 90, 91-92, 96, 98, 99-101.

An accomplished female writer, whose graceful criticisms we have frequently had occasion to quote in the course of this volume, speaks with enthusiasm of the lyrics just referred to:

"We of this age, a little too careless perhaps of learned labour, would give a whole wilderness of Catullines and Poetasters, and even of Alchemists and Volpones, for another score of the exquisite lyrics which are scattered carelessly through the plays and masques which—strange contrast with the rugged verse in which they are imbedded—seem to have burst into being at a stroke, just as the evening primrose flings open her fair petals at the close of the day. Lovell's songs were never written than these wild and irregular ditties."—Mary Russell Mitford's Recollections of a Literary Life.

We shall hardly feel that we can willingly pass on to the next article in our Dictionary without quoting some opinions respecting our author from some of the great men of his own day and the age which followed. The best-known of such passages is that which bears the imprimatur of Jonson's host of April, 1619.—Drummond of Hawthornden. None of the abundant censures lavished upon his hero more excites the indignation of Gifford than these jottings of the unfortunate Boswell of the age of James I. But, if Drummond was not the victim of the furor biographicus, surely Gifford was, and therefore (to borrow from Dr. Johnson's letter to James Macpherson) regard is to be paid less to what he says than what he is able to prove. The easy and confident arrogance with which Gifford contradicts the assertions of Jonson's contemporaries, of those who lived in the succeeding few years, and of later authorities, who perhaps had as good information, and certainly far better manners, than the editor of the Quarterly, is not a little amusing. We are not insensible to the value of his critical labours, and have no disposition to endorse Mr. Leigh Hunt's assertion that

"Sympathy with Jonson's coarseness and his love of the canstic, a poor verbal tact, and a worship of authority, were the only qualifications for a critical sense of him possessed by the petulant and presumptuous Gifford."—Men, Women, and Books: Suckling and Ben Jonson.

But surely Gifford might have displayed all that he had to offer in its best light, without so ruthlessly assailing his predecessors. In the words of a late critic,

"The author's one plan for reinstating Jonson in the good opinion of his countrymen is to fall foul of every critic, old or recent, that had ever said a word against him."—North British Review, Feb. 1856.

We may remark, in passing, that a notice of Barry Cornwall's edit. of Jonson's Works, already referred to by us, will be found in Leigh Hunt's Men, Women, and Books. Whilst Jonson was Drummond's guest, it was the custom of the latter to register the sayings of the distinguished sojourner, and at the conclusion of these piquant entries he takes the opportunity to record his own opinion of the characteristics of his visitor, who, he tells us, was "A great lover and praiser of himself; a contemner and scorner of others; given rather to lose a friend than a jest; jealous of every word and action of those about him, especially after drink, which is one of the elements in which he lived; a dissembler of ill parts which reign in him; a bragger of some good that he wanted; thinketh nothing well done but what either he himself or some of his friends hath said or done. He is passionately kind and angry, careless either to gain or keep; vindictive, but, if he be well answered at himself, interprets best sayings and deeds often to the worst. He was for any religion, as being versed in both; oppressed with fancy, which hath ever mastered his reason,—a general disease in many poets; his inventions are smooth and easy, but above all he excelleth in a translation."—Drummond's Works, 1711, fol. 224-226.

It is only proper to remark that Drummond's notes are not correctly printed in this folio ed. of 1711. A correct text, with illustrative notes, was for the first time printed, in 1842, by the Shakespeare Society, under the editorial supervision of Mr. David Laing, by whom the MS. was discovered. We have already noticed (see DRUMMOND, WM.) Mr. Peter Cunningham's ed. of Drummond's Works, 1833, 12mo. A new ed. by the same editor was pub. in 1852, Edin., 8vo.

The first charge which Drummond prefers in the above indictment is unfortunately too fully endorsed by contemporary evidence to admit of any debate. To say nothing of Owen Feltham's admirable parody upon Jonson's "Come, leave the loathed stage,"—a burst of indignation at the failure of his play of The New Inn,—we have a letter from Howell upon this theme, a few lines of which we shall quote:

"Six:—I was invited yesternight to a solemn supper by B. J. [Ben Jonson,] where you were deeply remembered: there was good company, excellent cheer, choice wines, and jovial welcome: one thing intervened, which almost spoiled the relish of the rest,—that B. began to engross all the discourse, to vapour extremely by himself, and, by vilifying others, to magnify his own muse. T. Ca. [Tom Carew] buzzed me in the ear, that though Ben had bartered up a great deal of knowledge, yet it seems he had not read the ethics, which, among other precepts of morality, forbid self-commendation, declaring it to be an ill-favoured solecism in good manners. . . . But, for my part, I am content to dispense with the Roman infirmity of Ben, now that time hath snowed upon his pericranium. You know Ovid and (your) Horace were subject to this humour,—the first bursting out into—

"Jamaque opus exegi, quod nec Jovis ira nec ignis," &c.

"The other into—

"Exegi monumentum aere perennius," &c.

"As also Cicero, while he forced himself into this hexameter:

"O fortunatum natam me consule Romanum."

"There is another reason that excuseth B. J.—which is, that if one be allowed to love the natural issue of his body, why not that of his brain, which is of a spiritual and more noble extraction?"—To Sir Thomas Hawk, Kt., Westminster, 5th April, 1636.

See our Life of JAMES HOWELL, No. 3, in this Dictionary. It was well that Howell bore this infliction so well, for Gerard Langbaine tells us that "Ben Jonson's greatest weakness was that he could not bear censure," and again,

"He was a Man of a very free Temper, and withal blunt, and somewhat haughty to those who were either Rivals in Fame, or Enemies to his Writings, (witness his Feetaster, wherein he falls upon Pecker, and his answer to Dr. Ovi, who writ against his Magical Lady;) otherwise of a good Sociable Humour, when amongst his Sons, and Friends in the Apoll; from whose Laws the reader may possibly better judge of his Temper; a copy of which I have transcribed for the Learnd Readers perusal."—Account of the Eng. Dramat. Poets, Ox., 1691.

They were a merry set of fellows that met at The Apoll and at The Mermaid,—too merry by half, or rather too free with the stimulants that provoked their merriment. When Frank Beaumont was paying a visit in the country, he felt the loss of these highly-seasoned festivities, and thus pours out his troubles into the bosom of his correspondent, Rare Ben:

"Methinks the little wit I had is lost
Since I saw you; for wit is like a rest
Held up at Tennis, which men do the best
With the best gamesters. What things have we seen Done at the Mermaid! heard words that have been So nimble, and so full of subtle flame,
As if that every one, from whom they came,
Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest,
And had resolved to live a fool the rest
Of his dull life."

It had been better for the whole company had they loved their own firesides more and the Mermaids and Apollos less. Of this gay circle Master Shakspeare was a prominent member, and good old Thomas Fuller tells us

"Many were the wit-combats, (i.e. combats,) the last edition of Fuller, from which we quote, prints it) betwixt him and Ben Jonson; which two I behold like a Spanish great galleon and an English man-of-war: Master Jonson (like the former) was built far higher in learning; solid, but slow in his performance. Shakspeare, with the English man-of-war, lesser in bulk but lighter in sailing, could turn with all tides, tack about, and take advantage of all winds, by the quickness of his wit and invention."—Worthies of England, Lon., 1840, iii. 284-285.

As Fuller was only eight years of age when Shakspeare died, he of course does not intend us to understand the word "behold" in its literal sense. Jonson was not always disposed to engage in these wit-combats, for, as Fuller himself tells us in another place,

"He would sit silent in a learned company, and suck in (besides wine) their several humours into his observation. What was ore in others, he was able to refine to himself.

"He was paramount in the dramatic part of poetry, and taught the stage an exact conformity to the laws of comedians. His comedies were above the volge, (which are only tickled with downright obscenity,) and took not so well at the first stroke as at the rebound, when beheld the second time: yes, they will endure reading and that due commendation so long as either ingenuity or learning are fashionable in our nation. If his later be not so sprightly and vigorous as his first pieces, all that are old wit, and all that desire to be old should, excuse him therein."—Ibid., ii. 426.

"The most learned, judicious, and correct, generally so accounted, of our English Comedians, and the more admired for being so, for that neither the height of natural parts, for he was no Shakspeare, nor the cost of extraordinary education, for he is reported but a bricklayer's son, but his own proper industry and addiction to books advanced him to this perfection."—Phillips's Theat. Poet. Anglic.; Brydges's ed., 1800, 241-250, q. v.

The comparison between Shakspeare and Jonson—whom before Gifford's Memoir it was the fashion to represent as the enemy and vilifier of his illustrious brother—is a favourite topic with many critics. It is not omitted in Dryden's admirable summary of the literary characteristics of Ben Jonson:

"As for Jonson, to whose character I am now arrived, if we look upon him while he was himself, (for his last plays were but his dotages), I think him the most learned and judicious writer which any theatre ever had. He was a most severe judge of himself as well as others. One cannot say he wanted wit, but rather that he was frugal of it. In his works you find little to retrench or alter. Wit and language, and humour also in some measure, we had before him, but something of art was wanting to the drama before he came. He managed his strength to more advantage than any which preceded him. You seldom find him making love in any of his scenes, or endeavouring to move the passions: his genius was too sullen and saturnine to do it gracefully, especially when he knew he came after those who had performed both to such a height. Humour was his proper sphere, and in that he delighted most to present mechanical people. He was deeply conversant in the ancients, both Greek and Latin, and he borrowed boldly from them. There is scarce a poet or historian among the Roman authors of those times whom he has not translated in 'Sejanus' or 'Catiline.' But he has done his robberies so openly that one may see he fears not to be taxed by any law. He invades authors like a monarch, and what would be theft in other poets is only victory in him. With the spoils of these writers, he so represents Old Rome to us, in its rites, ceremonies, and customs, that if one of their poets had written either of his tragedies, it was that he weaved it too closely and laboriously, in his comedies especially; perhaps, too, he did a little too much Romanize our language, leaving the words he translated almost as much Latin as he found them, wherein, though he learnedly followed their language, he did not enough comply with the idioms of ours. If I would compare him with Shakspeare, I must acknowledge him the most correct poet, but Shakspeare the greater wit. Shakspeare was the Homer or father of dramatic poets, Jonson was the Virgil, the pattern of elaborate writing. I admire him, but I love Shakspeare."

Sir Walter Scott thus contrasts Jonson and Shakspeare:

"The one is like an ancient statue, the beauty of which, springing from the exactness of the proportion, does not always strike at first sight, but rises upon us as we bestow time in considering it; the other is the representation of a monster, which is at first only surprising, and ludicrous and disgusting ever after."—Life of Dryden.

The following lines from an old play, entitled Retrvne from Parnassus, pub. in 1606, (ten years before Shakspeare's death,) are too pertinent to our subject to be omitted:

"Who looses Adonis loose, or Lucres rape,
His sweeter verse contaynes hart robbing life,
Could but a graver subject him content,
Without looses the foolish lasy languishment."—Act I. Scene II.
"Few of the university pen piales well: they smell too much of that writer Ovid, and that writer Metamorphosis, and talke too much of Proserpina & Juppiter. Why heres our fellow Shakspeare puts them all downe, I and Ben Jonson too. O that Ben Jonson is a pestilent fellow, he brought vp Horace giuing the Poets a pill, but our fellow Shakspeare hath giuen him a purge that made him beray his credit."—Act IV. Scene III.

We would fain quote from Hazlitt's lively comparison between these two great poets, but this our space forbids. The reader must himself turn to Lecture II. of the series on the English Comic Writers. The commendations of the Great Earl of Clarendon and Lord Falkland (both personal friends of Jonson) are too weighty, and the poetical portrait of Churchill too admirably drawn, to be omitted in a biographical article of Rare Ben Jonson.

"His name," says Lord Clarendon, "can never be forgotten, having by his very good learning, and the severity of his nature and manners, very much reformed the stage; and indeed the English poetry itself. His natural advantages were, judgment to order and govern fancy, rather than excess of fancy; his productions being slow and upon deliberation, yet then abounding with great wit and fancy, and will live accordingly; and surely as he did exceedingly exalt the English language in eloquence, propriety, and masculine expressions, so he was the best judge of, and fitted to prescribe rules to, poetry and poets, of any man who had lived with, or before him, or since: if Mr. Cowley had not made a flight beyond all men, with that modesty yet as to ascribe much of this to the example of learning of Ben Jonson. His conversation was very good, and with the men of most note."

The assertion last quoted is supported by the testimony of the other nobleman whom we have mentioned as one of the poet's admiring friends:

"To him how daily flock'd, what reverence gave,
All that had wit, or would be thought to have;
How the wise too did with mere wits agree,
As Pembroke, Portland, and grave D'Aubigny;
Nor thought the rigid'st senator a shame
To add his praise to so deserv'd a fame!"

Lord Falkland's Ed.

Churchill's lifelike portrait must conclude an article which has grown on our hands considerably beyond our intended limits:

"Next Jonson sat, in ancient learning train'd:
His rigid judgment Fancy's flight restrain'd,
Correctly prun'd each wild luxuriant thought,
Mark'd out her course, nor spard a glorious fault.
The book of man he read with nicest art,
And ransack'd all the secrets of the heart;
Excited Penetration's utmost force,
And trac'd each passion to its proper source;
Then, strongly mark'd, in liveliest colours drew,
And brought each fable forth to public view.
The oxcomb felt a lash in every word,
And fools, hung out, their brother fools deterr'd;
His comic humour kept the world in awe,
And laughter frighten'd folly more than law."

Jorden, Edward, 1569-1632, a London physician, a native of Kent, pub. four medical treatises, 1603-31.

Jortin, John, D.D. 1698-1770, a native of St. Giles's, Middlesex, admitted of Jesus College, Cambridge, (of which he became Fellow,) 1715; Rector of St. Dunstan-in-the-East, London, 1751; Vicar of Kensington, and Prob. of St. Paul's, 1762; Archdeacon of London, 1764. He was a man of great learning, fine taste, and much vivacity of imagination, an accomplished critic, and a warm friend to the diffusion of sound knowledge. His principal works are the following. 1. Lusus Poetici, Lon., 1722; 1748, 4to. These are a few Latin poems. There is said to be a 3d ed. 2. Four Serms. on the Truth of the Christian Religion, 1730, 8vo. 3. Miscellaneous Remarks on Authors Ancient and Modern, 1731-32, 2 vols. 8vo. New ed. of Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, edited by the Rev. W. Trollope, 1846, 2 vols. 8vo. It has been remarked that this work might properly be entitled Curiosities of Ecclesiastical History. The Remarks

"do not embrace a regular series of facts, but point out the prominent parts and circumstances of the general subject, with interesting remarks."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P., ed. 1843, 32s, q. v.

"Once, and rarely more than once, he rose to eloquence; and that was in the preface to his Remarks, &c., which the late Dr. Gosset told me he regularly read through, every year, with undiminished delight. . . . The Remarks are excellent,—pithy, learned, candid, and acute; presenting us with the marrow of his predecessors."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

"Dr. Jortin, in one of his Six Dissertations, (half a dozen too many,) thus paints the portrait of Achilles, &c."—PROFESSOR JOHN WILSON: Essays Critical and Imaginative, Edin. and Lon., 1857, iv. 163, q. v.

"Equally remarkable for taste, learning, originality, and ingenuity."—DR. V. KNOX.

Bishop Warburton thought otherwise, as the Sixth Dissertation proved so conclusively the great antiquity of the doctrine of a future state as to overthrow the prelate's leading and most absurd position in The Divine Legation of Moses. Hurd, therefore, ever ready for such service, took up the cudgels for his friend, and Warburton, in his letters to Hurd, attacks Jortin with his usual arrogance, petulance, and indecency. See Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors, in Miscell. of Lit., ed. Lon., 1840, 166; Lord Jeffrey's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 889-890; Blackwood's Mag., xxix. 901; and authorities cited below.

7. The Life of Erasmus, with Remarks on his Works, 1758-60, 2 vols. 4to; 1806, 3 vols. 8vo. Vol. iii. is composed entirely of Original Documents, and extracts from the writings of Erasmus and other writers. An abridgment of Jortin's Life of Erasmus was pub. by A. Laycey, Lon., 1805, 8vo.

"Having been long an object of universal admiration, it is a matter of surprise that his life has never been written with accuracy and judgment. This task was reserved for Dr. Jortin; and the avidity with which it is read by the learned is a proof of the merit of the execution."—DR. V. KNOX.

"The ease, simplicity, and vigour of this engaging writer, (I speak of the biographer,) who negligently scatters learning and vivacity on every subject which he treats, are here exercised on a most congenial topic."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, (4to.) p. 13.

"In his Life of Erasmus, Jortin showed himself to be little more than a translator of Le Clerc. A subject of the greatest is made by him one of comparatively small interest. The work is little better than a dry journal of facts, stitched together. . . . It is usefully and carefully compiled, but wholly unanimated by a stroke of genius. The life of one of the greatest wits of his age has produced only sombre biographies. . . . These volumes . . . are doubtless unworthy of their author."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

"Every scholar well read in the writings of Erasmus and his contemporaries must have discovered that Jortin has neither collected sufficient nor the best materials for his work; and perhaps for that very cause he grew weary of his task before he had made a full use of the scanty materials which he had collected."—*S. New eds., 1809, 4 vols. 8vo; 1836, 4 vols. 8vo. Abridged by the Rev. G. Whitaker, 1825, 3 vols. 8vo; 1826, 3 vols. 8vo; 1828, 3 vols. 8vo.

"In these Sermons good sense and sound morality appear,—not, indeed, dressed out in the meretricious ornaments of a florid style, but in all the manly force and simple graces of natural eloquence. They will always be read with pleasure and edification."—DR. F. KNOX'S ESSAYS.

9. Tracts, Philological, Critical, and Miscellaneous, 1790, 2 vols. 8vo. Pub. by the author's son.

"The various treatises in these volumes are highly commended by Bishop Newton, T. Walton, and Dr. Knox."

It is to be regretted that, in these days of republication of standard authors, a collective ed. of the works of Dr. Jortin should still be a desideratum. Mr. Strong, of Exeter, some years since, offered a set of all of this divine's works, together with Disney's Life of Jortin,—in all 22 vols. 8vo,—for £8 8s. For further information respecting this excellent writer, see Dr. John Disney's Life of Jortin, 1792, 8vo; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Chalmers's Biog. Diet.; Blackwood's Mag., xxix. 901-902; xxx. 851; xxxiii. 873.

"The works of Bishop Warburton and Dr. Jortin will speak for them better than any private commendation: they were two very extraordinary men; they were both men of great parts and abilities, both men of uncommon learning and erudition, both able critics, both copious writers. . . . Every thing that proceeds from Jortin is of value, whether in poetry, criticism, or divinity."—BISHOP NEWTON.

"A poet, a divine, a philosopher, and a man, Dr. Jortin served the cause of religion, learning, and morality."—DR. V. KNOX.

"Dr. Jortin was an accomplished classical scholar: his style often bears a resemblance to that of Xenophon, in ease, &c."—WILLIAMS.

"As to Jortin, whether I look back to his verse, to his prose, to his critical or to his theological works, there are few authors to whom I am so much indebted for rational entertainment or for solid instruction."—DR. PARR: Parr's Tracts by a Warburtonian, q. v.

Joscelin de Brakelonde, almoner of the Abbey of St. Edmund's, 1211, wrote a history of the affairs of his abbey, 1173-1201, and a book on the pretended miracles of St. Robert. An edit. of Joscelin's Chronicle, from the Latin original, was pub. by the Camden Society, edited by J. Gage Bokewode, 1840, 4to, and a trans. of this ed., with Notes, Introduction, &c., by T. E. Tomlins, 1843, 8vo. See these works and Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, 1846.

"The author [Jocelin] appears to have been well acquainted with the common Latin authors, but his latinity is singularly unclassical and inelegant."—WRIGHT, ubi supra.

Joseph of Exeter, or Josephus Iscanus, an Anglo-Latin poet temp. Richard I., a native of Devonshire, wrote two epic poems in Latin heroics: the first, in six books, is on the Trojan war; the other is entitled Antiocheis, the War of Antioch. Of the last, the only fragment which remains (22 lines) will be found in Warton's Hist. of English Poetry, and in Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period. Leland also attributes to Joseph epigrams and love-verses, (Nugæ Amatoris), and it is asserted that he wrote in Latin verse De Institutione Cyri; but no such productions are known to be extant. For an account of the edita. of the poem De Bello Trojano, see Wright, ubi supra. See also Leland; Bale; Pits; Prince's Worthies of Devon; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.; The Sketch-Book, (art. on The Mutability of Literature,) by Washington Irving.

"A miracle of this age in classical composition was Joseph of Exeter, commonly called Josephus Iscanus. . . . He appears to have possessed no common command of poetical phraseology, and wanted nothing but a knowledge of the Virgilian chastity. His style is a mixture of Ovid, Statius, and Claudian, who seem then to have been the popular patterns."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet., ed. Lon., 1840, vol. I. cxxvii, cxxviii.

Warton remarks that Italy had at that time produced no poet comparable to Josephus Iscanus. It has been stated that this poet died about 1224, but of the true date nothing is certainly known.

He pub. his impressions of the country in two works, viz.: 1. New England's Rarities Discovered, in Birds, Beasts, Fishes, Serpents, and Plants of that Country, &c., with Cuts, Lon., 1672, '74, '75, 8vo. 2. An Account of two Voyages to New England, &c., 1674, 12mo. A Chronological Table of the most Remarkable Passages, from the First Discovery of the Continent of America to 1673, is appended to the above.

"The relation is curious and faithful: when the author makes his own remarks, they are in the oddest uncouth expressions imaginable."—JOHN LOCKE: The Philosopher.

"Contains a variety of curious facts regarding medicine and surgery: the author, however, appears a little credulous."—WATT's Bibl. Brit.

A little credulous certainly, for he tells us, "Some frogs, when they sit upon their breech, are a foot high;" "barley frequently degenerates into oats." Judson, Adoniram, D.D., b. Aug. 9, 1788, at Malden, Mass., d. 1850, at sea, on his voyage to Rangoon, a Baptist divine, the founder of the Burmah Mission in 1815, wrote a work on Christian Baptism, (recently repub.,) &c., were put forth by various publishers before 1772, in which year Mr. Henry Sampson Woodfall, the original printer of the epistles, issued an edition in 2 vols. sm. 8vo, with the sanction of Junius, and an eloquent Dedication, Preface, and Notes, by the same mysterious individual. In 1812, 3 vols. 8vo, Mr. George Woodfall pub. a new edition of these celebrated letters. In this edit. we have not only the Letters of Junius referred to above, but also his private letters to H. S. Woodfall, his correspondence with John Wilkes, and other communications to Woodfall's Public Advertiser, under various signatures, ascribed to him with more or less probability of truth. The period during which the Letters of Junius and those thus ascribed to him were written extends from the letter of Poplicola, 28th April, 1767, to the letter of Nemesis, May 12, 1772. Woodfall's edition contains—

I. The Letters of Junius distinctively so called, and acknowledged by him, dated January 21, 1769, to January 21, 1772.

Of the 69 Letters in this series, 59 were written by Junius; of which 44 bear the signature of Junius, and 15 the signature of Philo-Junius. Of the 44 letters signed Junius, the titles are as follows:

To the Printer of the Public Advertiser.....	10
“ Sir Wm. Draper.....	5
“ the Duke of Grafton.....	11
“ Edward Weston.....	1
“ Dr. Wm. Blackstone.....	1
On Walpole's Case.....	1
To the Duke of Bedford.....	1
On the Rescue of General Ganuel.....	1
On Modestus.....	1
Address to the King.....	1
Retrospect of Parliamentary Session.....	1
To Lord North.....	1
“ Chief-Justice Mansfield.....	3
On the Falkland Islands.....	1
On Privileges of Parliament.....	1
On Parliamentary Resolutions.....	1
To the Rev. Mr. Horne.....	1
“ “ Livery of London.....	1
	44

Of the 15 Letters signed Philo-Junius (really written by Junius) the titles are as follows:

On Walpole's Case.....	1
“ the Spanish Convention.....	1
To the Printer of the Public Advertiser.....	10
“ Modestus.....	1
“ Zeno.....	1
“ an Advocate in the Cause of the People.....	1
	15

Of the other 10 Letters the titles are:

Sir Wm. Draper to the Printer of the Public Advertiser.....	1
Sir Wm. Draper to Junius.....	4
The Rev. Mr. Horne to Junius.....	3
A Friend of Junius.....	1
On behalf of Junius: anonymous.....	1
	10

II. Junius's Private Letters to Mr. H. S. Woodfall, dated April 20, 1769, to January 19, 1773. In this series there are 64 Letters and Notes, 62 of which are addressed by Junius to Woodfall, 1 to David Garrick, and the other (the conclusion of the series) is a letter of Woodfall's to Junius, dated March 7, 1773.

III. Junius's Confidential Correspondence with John Wilkes, containing 18 Letters, 10 of which are written by Junius, and 8 by Wilkes. These letters are dated 21st August, 1771, to January 15, 1772.

IV. The Miscellaneous Letters ascribed to Junius, under various signatures, consisting of 113 letters and papers, 28th April, 1769, to May 12, 1772, which occupy part of the second and the whole of the third volumes. The authenticity of many of these productions is very questionable. Prefixed to this edition, which is illustrated by notes, is an admirable Preliminary Essay on Junius and his Writings, by the editor, John Mason Good, M.D.

A new edition of the issue of 1812 was published in 1850, 2 vols. 12mo, which contains much additional matter of great value. This forms part of Bohn's Standard Library, and is edited by John Wade, who favours us with New Evidence as to the Authorship, and a portion of an Analysis, by the late Sir N. Harris Nicolas. Mr. Wade makes out a strong case for the claim of Sir Philip Francis. There are, however, some grave objections to this hypothesis, which we hardly expect to see surmounted. See, in addition to authorities to be cited hereafter, London Athenæum, 1850, 125, 154, 863, 939, 969, 993, 1021, 1071.

The curious reader will be glad to see a list of the most prominent names of those to whom the Letters of Junius have been at one time or another ascribed:

1. Adair, Mr. Serjeant.	23. Jones, Sir Wm.
2. Barré, Col. Isaac.	24. Kent, John.
3. Boyd, Hugh Macaulay.	25. Lee, General Charles.
4. Burke, Edmund.	26. Lloyd, Charles.
5. Butler, Bishop.	27. Lyttelton, Lord Thos.
6. Camden, Lord.	28. Macleary, Laughlin.
7. Chatham, Lord.	29. Portland, Duke of.
8. Chesterfield, Lord.	30. Pownall, Gov. Thomas.
9. De Lolme, M.	31. Rich, Sir Robert.
10. Dunning, Lord Ashburton.	32. Roberts, John.
11. Dyer, Samuel.	33. Rosenhagen, Rev. Philip.
12. Flood, Henry.	34. Sackville, Lord George, afterwards Lord Germain.
13. Francis, Philip, D.D.	35. Shelburne, Earl.
14. Francis, Sir Philip.	36. Temple, Earl.
15. Gibbon, Edward.	37. Tooke, Jno. Horne.
16. Glever, Richard.	38. Walpole, Horace.
17. Grattan, Henry.	39. Wilkes, John.
18. Grestrakes, Wm.	40. Wedderburn, Alex. (Lord Loughborough.)
19. Grenville, Geo.	41. Wilmot, James, D.D.
20. Grenville, James.	42. Wray, Daniel.
21. Hamilton, Wm. Gerard.
22. Hollis, James.

Of the 42 names above enumerated, the claims of 13—viz.: Boyd, Burke, Bishop Butler, Dunning, Dyer, Flood, General Lee, Lloyd, Roberts, Rosenhagen, and Lord George Sackville—are carefully examined by Dr. Good in his celebrated preliminary essay, and all are decidedly rejected. As the question now stands, the sifting of zealous and learned controversy has spared but three names out of all those for whom the authorship has from time to time been claimed,—viz.:

I. SIR PHILIP FRANCIS.

II. LORD GEORGE SACKVILLE, afterwards LORD GERMAIN.

III. COLONEL ISAAC BARRÉ.

The claims of the last two candidates in the field, Sir Robert Rich and Gov. Thos. Pownall, have been recently brought prominently forward,—those of the former by Mr. Ayerst, in 1853, and of the latter by Mr. Frederick Griffin, of Montreal, in 1854. Mr. Dove, indeed, has within the last few months announced new discoveries in favour of the claims of the Earl of Chatham, but in the present stage of the question—for Mr. Dove's book is hardly yet fairly before the world—we do not feel justified in adding his lordship's name to the three who still exhibit indications of vitality after enduring the targets of a keen literary battle of fourscore years' duration.

We shall presently give a list of publications connected with the Junius controversy, but it may be proper here briefly to refer to some prominent pleas for the respective claims of the three above named.

I. SIR PHILIP FRANCIS. 1. The Identity of Junius with a distinguished Living Character, by Mr. John Taylor, Lon., 1816, 8vo. 2. A Supplement to Junius Identified, consisting of Fac-Similes of Handwriting, and other Illustrations, 1817, 8vo. 3. Review of the two preceding, by Lord Brougham, Edin. Rev., November, 1817, xxix. 94. His lordship thus sums up the evidence presented by Mr. Taylor:

“That it proves Sir Philip to be Junius, we will not affirm; but this we can safely assert, that it accumulates such a mass of circumstantial evidence as renders it extremely difficult to believe he is not; and that, if so many coincidences shall be found to have misled us in this case, our faith in all conclusions drawn from proof of a similar kind may henceforth be shaken.”

4. Letter of Sir James Mackintosh to John Murray, Sr., Nov. 28, 1824. See No. 10. 5. Argument by Thomas De Quincey, in his Literary Reminiscences, vol. ii., being vol. vii. (chap. xxii.) of Ticknor, Reed & Field's edit. of De Quincey's works. 6. Argument by T. B. Macaulay, in his review of Gleig's Life of Warren Hastings, Edin. Rev., Oct. 1841, lxxiv. 160. 7. Letter of Lady Francis (widow of Sir Philip) to Lord Campbell, inserted in his lordship's Lives of the Lord-Chancellors, vol. vi. p. 344. 8. The History and Discovery of Junius, by John Wade, in his edit. of the Letters of Junius, 1850, 2 vols. 8vo, before referred to. 9. Some New Facts and a suggested New Theory as to the Authorship of the Letters of Junius, by Sir Fortunatus Dwarrie, Knt., Lon., 1850. Privately printed. See London Athenæum, 1850, 939, 969, 993. 10. Argument by Lord Mahon, in his History of England from the Peace of Utrecht, vol. v. 320-340, 1851. Nos. 4 and 11 are printed in this work. 11. Letter of T. B. Macaulay to John

Murray, Jr., dated at the Albany, Jan. 3, 1852. See No. 10. This refers to the famous article in the London Quar. Rev. for Dec. 1851, xc. 91, advocating the claims of Lord Thomas Lyttelton to the authorship of Junius, and rejecting altogether the pleas urged in favour of Sir Philip Francis. But Lord Lyttelton's claims have been since set aside, (see London Athenæum,) and the question remains status quo ante bellum. In the letter above referred to, Mr. Macaulay remarks:

"But, in truth, the strongest arguments against the Reviewers' theory are the arguments which, in my opinion, prove that Francis was the author of the letters."

Mr. Macaulay despatches the claims of five celebrated names—claims which have been urged with much pertinacity and some of them at great length—in as many lines:

"Lord Lyttelton's claims to the authorship of Junius are better than those of Burke or Barré, and quite as good as those of Lord George Sackville or Single-Speech Hamilton. But the case against Francis, or, if you please, in favour of Francis, rests on grounds of a very different kind, and on coincidences such as would be sufficient to convict a murderer."

II. LORD GEORGE SACKVILLE, afterwards LORD GERMAIN. We need here only refer to George Coventry's Critical Inquiry regarding the real author of the Letters of Junius, proving them to have been written by Lord Viscount Sackville, 1825, 8vo. This theory was sustained in a work pub. in Boston, U. States, in 1828, entitled Junius Unmasked, or Lord George Sackville proved to be Junius, and in a review of this vol. in the N. American Rev., xxix. 315, by G. B. Cheever. Charles Butler (see his Reminiscences) supposes Lord Sackville to have been the author of Junius, and Sir Philip Francis his amanuensis and occasional assistant. Mr. Jaques, in his History of Junius and his Works, and a Review of the Controversy, 1843, 8vo, adopts this theory, and adds D'Oyly—Francis's fellow-clerk in the War-Office—as a connecting-link between Lord Sackville and Francis.

III. COLONEL ISAAC BARRÉ. Mr. John Britton, in his Authorship of the Letters of Junius Elucidated, 1848, r. 8vo, earnestly contends that Colonel Barré was Junius, and that he was assisted by Lord Shelburne and Mr. Dunning. In an article pub. in the London Morning Herald in 1813, the opinion was expressed that the Earl of Shelburne was Junius, and that he was assisted by Barré and Dunning. This work is noticed by the author of the article in the London Quar. Rev., xc. 91, before referred to, as "a curious instance of the delusion to which ingenious men may resign themselves when they have a favourite opinion to uphold."

An elaborate review of Mr. Britton's work will be found in the London Athenæum, July 22 and 29, 1848. And see other articles referred to in the course of the present notice.

We shall now proceed to give a list of publications connected with this perplexing subject, which to the minds of many of the most intelligent readers of the day is as much a mystery as it was to their grandfathers. Whether this cloud will ever be lifted from the name is now doubtful. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine in what way the authorship of the Letters of Junius can ever be satisfactorily proved, presuming that the claims of the real author have been, or shall hereafter be, presented to the public for acceptance. If the arguments in favour of the authorship of Sir Philip Francis, or Lord Sackville, or both combined, be insufficient to gain credence, what amount of evidence can identify the real author? Certain it is that against even Junius himself, whoever he may be, many probabilities will apparently exist. It can be only by the preponderance of favourable testimony that any such claim can be established. Not a year elapses in which some man is not hanged on less evidence than has been adduced in favour of more than one of the claimants of the authorship of the Letters of Junius. But we must proceed with our list of publications.

1769. 1. An Impartial Answer to the Doctrine delivered in a Letter which appeared in the Public Advertiser under the signature of Junius. By Charles Fearné, 8vo. 2. Interesting Letters selected from the Correspondence of Messrs. Wilkes, Horne, Beckford, and Junius, 8vo. 3. A Collect. of the Letters of Atticus, Lucius, Junius, and others; with Observ. and Notes, 8vo. 4. The Political Contest; being a Cont. of Junius's Letters from the 6th of July to the present time, 8vo. 5. The Political Contest; containing a Series of Letters between Junius and Sir Will. Draper; also the whole of Junius's Letters to his Grace the Duke of G...., 8vo.

1770. 6. An Address to Junius upon the subject of his Letter in the Public Advertiser, Dec. 19, 1769, 8vo. In this address the Letters are attributed to Wilkes.

1771. 7. Letters addressed to the King, the Duke of Grafton, the Earls of Chesterfield and Sandwich, Lord Barrington, Junius, and the Rev. Mr. Horne, under the signature of P. P. S., 8vo. 8. An Answer to Junius, 8vo. 9. The Trial of John Almon, Bookseller, for selling Junius's Letters to the K—g, 8vo. 10. The Genuine Letters of Junius, and Anecdotes of the Author. The compiler attributes the letters to Edmund Burke.

1772. 11. Woodfall's—the first authorised—edit. of the Letters of Junius, 2 vols. sm. 8vo.

1774. 12. Epistle to Junius, by Benj. Hughes, 4to.

1778. 13. Serious Letter to the Public, by Junius, 8vo. Fictitious.

1788. 14. Anecdotes of Junius: to which is prefixed the King's Reply, 8vo.

1789. 15. Junius Discovered, by P. T., 8vo. Junius is supposed to be John Horne Tooke.

1794. 16. Letters of Junius, 2 vols. 8vo.

1797. 17. Letters of Junius, 2 vols. 8vo, Bensley's beautiful ed., illustrated by portraits. A copy on vellum was sold at auction in London in 1804 for £25 4s.

1854. 72. Junius Discovered. By F. Griffin, at Boston, Mass., 1857, 12mo. Mr. Griffin advocates the claims of Gov. Thos. Pownall. 73. Junius—Lord Chatham, &c., by William Dowe, N. York, 1857, 12mo. A review of the works of Mr. Griffin and Mr. Dowe will be found in the Lon. Athen., July 17, 1858. The tone of the critique is indicated in the opening paragraph:

"Two more volumes of mere speculation, both from the other side of the Atlantic."

74. The Beauties and Maxims of Junius, by Lye, and 75. the Selection of Aphorisms, by Fisher, being merely compilations, need be barely referred to. The notes to Heron's edit. of Junius are worthy of attention. The reader will find much ingenious criticism, and many plausible suppositions, in several of the following articles enumerated in Poole's Index to Periodical Literature.

I. AUTHORSHIP OF JUNIUS: 1. Edin. Rev., xxix. 94, (by Lord Brougham.) A writer in the Lon. Gent. Mag. (Dec. 1845, p. 587) ascribes this article to Sir Jas. Mackintosh; but he is in error: Lord Brougham has recently repub. it in his Contributions to the Edin. Rev., Lon. and Glasg., 1856, iii. 338-361. 2. N. Amer. Rev., xxix. 315, (by G. B. VII. 22. Arguments in favour of the claims of Lachlan McLane to the authorship of Junius, in Waldie's (Philadelphia) Library, (by John Jay Smith, editor.)

In addition to these, the reader will find many excellent articles upon the general question, or specialties connected with it, in the London Athenæum, Blackwood's Mag. (see Index to vols. I.-L.), and other periodicals. We would particularly instance a paper entitled, SIR PHILIP FRANCIS not JUNIUS, in the Lon. Gent. Mag., Feb. 1842, 166-168; and one by John Foster, entitled Who was Junius? (a review of Woodfall's ed. of Junius, 1813, 8vo.) in the Lon. Eccl. Mag., Feb. and April, 1813; repub. in Foster's Critical Essays, Lon., 1856, vol. ii. 72-105. We presume, however, that the reader will be satisfied with the bill of fare thus presented to him; and, as a stimulus to his investigations, we can assure him that those who have most thoroughly explored the field are generally those who avow themselves to be most in the dark upon the subject. After espousing and warmly advocating half a dozen theories on the subject, they usually end with no theory at all. Poor Sir N. Harris Nicolas, after diligently posting for many years, in mercantile-ledger style, the pros and cons in the Junius Papers, arrived at this very satisfactory result:

"So far from having any theory of our own on Junius's identity, we are as entirely free from bias on the subject, and confess ourselves as profoundly ignorant of the authorship of those celebrated Letters, as if, instead of having for many years constantly had the question in our mind, and having read, we believe, nearly every thing that has been written on the point, we had never bestowed a thought on the matter. We have indeed a strong impression that Junius was not any one of the numerous persons heretofore so confidently brought forward."

Not satisfied with this home-thrust at the "confident" Junius-discoverers, the worthy knight, wrought up to a high pitch of indignation by his ill-success, which forced him to speak his mind without restraint, proceeds in the following complimentary strain:

"However startling the idea may be to the many pseudo-discoverers of Junius on both sides of the Atlantic, we found much of the claim of our observations to attention in the very fact of our having no Junius of our own, and on our disbelief in each of theirs."

When we remember the eminence of Sir N. H. Nicolas as an antiquary, and the fact that the above was written as lately as 1843, we may estimate the probability of success in Junius-hunting. But Mr. Wade is quite confident that he has bagged the game; and perhaps he has.

Dr. John Mason Good concluded his investigations in 1812, in utter despair, and fifteen years later, only a few weeks before his death, writes to Mr. Barker, respecting this perplexing question,

"Many years ago, as you perhaps may be aware, I entered at full speed into this research, and beat the bush in every direction. At that time, however, the claims of Sir Philip Francis had not been advanced, at least not before the public. But had they been brought forward, the arguments by which it is obvious they may be met, and many of which you have yourself ably handled, would, I think, have succeeded in putting him as completely out of the list as all the other competitors appear to be put whose friends have undertaken to bring them forward. The question is nevertheless one of great interest as well on the score of national history as of literary curiosity. Yet, like many other desiderata, I am afraid it is likely to lie beyond the fathoming of any line and plummet that will be applied to it in our days."—Oct. 13, 1828.

Charles Butler, one of the most acute of lawyers, and peculiarly well skilled in legal and literary controversy, and who had moreover examined this subject with the personal assistance of John Wilkes, the correspondent of Junius himself, writes to Barker, in 1828,

"I am sorry I cannot communicate to you any information of importance on the subject in which you take so great an interest. I have only to add, that it appears to me involved in as great obscurity as ever."

And now—to descend to smaller things—we are encouraged by the candour of these eminent individuals to emulate their frankness; and we will be magnanimous enough to own that our researches have placed us exactly in the position of Messrs. Good, Nicolas, Butler, and some thousands of others in "pursuit of knowledge under difficulties."—we are altogether ignorant of the authorship of the LETTERS OF JUNIUS. We have no claim to question the veracity of this mysterious personage, who declared, "I am the sole depository of my secret, and it shall die with me." We have already quoted a portion of the eloquent comments of Dr. Good upon Junius as a writer, but we are not willing to conclude this article without citing some further authorities on this point:

"I quote JUNIUS in English, as I would Tacitus or Livy in Latin. I consider him as a legitimate English Classicist."—Mathias's Pursuits of Literature.

"Junius burst into notice with a blaze of impudence which has rarely glared upon the world before, and drew the rabble after him as a monster makes a show. When he had once provided for his safety by impenetrable secrecy, he had nothing to combat but truth and justice, enemies whom he knows to be feeble in the dark. Being then at liberty to indulge himself in all the immunities of invisibility, out of the reach of danger, he has been bold; out of the reach of shame, he has been confident. As a rhetorician, he has the art of persuading when he seconded desire; as a reasoner, he has convinced those who had no doubt before; as a moralist, he has taught that virtue may disgrace; and as a patriot, he has gratified the mean by insults on the high. . . . It is not by his liveliness of imagery, his pungency of periods, or his fertility of allusion, that he detains the eyes of London and the bores of Middlesex. Of style and sentiment they take no cognizance."—Dr. SAMUEL JOHNSON: On the Scenery of the Fulkland Islands, 1771.

The citation of this passage may remind the reader that an eminent modern critic has brought the names of Johnson and Junius into juxtaposition in his remarks upon the chronological history of English style:

"Adam Smith was nearly the first who made deeper reasonings and more exact knowledge popular among us, and Johnson and Junius the first who again familiarised us with more glowing and sonorous diction, and made us feel the tameness and poorness of the serious style of Addison and Swift."—Lord JEFFREY: Contrib. to Edin. Review, Lon., 1838, 77.

"How comes this Junius to have broke through the cobwebs of the law, and to range uncontrolled, unpunished, through the land? The myrmidons of the Court have been long, and are still, pursuing him in vain. They will not spend their time upon me, or you, or you. No: they disdain such vermin when the mighty boar of the forest, that has broken through all their toils, is before them. But what will all their efforts avail? No sooner has he wounded one than he lays another dead at his feet. For my part, when I saw his attack upon the king, I own my blood ran cold. . . . In short, after carrying away our Royal Eagle in his pounces and dashing him against a rock, he has laid you prostrate. Kings, Lords, and Commons are but the sport of his fury. Were he a member of this House, what might not be expected from his knowledge, his firmness and integrity! He would be easily known by his contempt of all danger, by his penetration, by his vigour. Nothing would escape his vigilance and activity. Bad ministers could conceal nothing from his sagacity; nor could promises nor threats induce him to conceal any thing from the public."—EDMUND BURKE: Speech in the House of Commons.

TESTIMONIALS,—ALLIBONE'S DICTIONARY OF AUTHORS.

From Washington Irving, Esq.
Sunnyside, Aug. 23, 1855.

Messrs. Childs & Peterson:

Gentlemen:—Accept my thanks for the specimen you have sent me of Mr. Allibone's Critical Dictionary of English Literature. The undertaking does honour to that gentleman's enterprise; and the manner in which, from the specimen before me, (464 pages,) he appears to execute it, does honour to his intelligence, perspicuity, wide and accurate research, impartiality, and good taste. When completed, the work cannot fail to be a valuable library companion and family book of reference. The beautiful manner in which the work is got up is highly creditable to American typography.

Very respectfully, gentlemen,
Your obliged and ob't servant,
WASHINGTON IRVING.

From Wm. C. Bryant, Esq.
New York, Aug. 29, 1855.

To Messrs. Childs & Peterson:

Gentlemen:—The specimen of Mr. Allibone's Critical Dictionary of Authors which you sent me has given me a high idea of the industry, exactness, and various reading of the author. I think it promises to be one of the most valuable works of reference which have been produced in the present century. The plan appears to me excellent, though difficult; but the difficulty has been happily overcome by the author's extraordinary research.

Truly yours, W. C. BRYANT.

From Jared Sparks, LL.D.
Cambridge, Sept. 1, 1855.

Gentlemen:—I have examined, with great satisfaction, the part of Mr. Allibone's Dictionary of English Literature which has already been published, (464 pages.) The plan appears to me an exceedingly good one: comprising, as it does, a notice of all the English and American authors down to the present time, with biographical incidents, an enumeration of their several publications, and frequent critical remarks.

An undertaking so comprehensive in its design requires vast diligence and research. As far as the author has proceeded, he seems to have executed his task with ability, good judgment, and success. When completed, the work cannot fail to be of great utility to all readers who would acquire a knowledge of books, and a most valuable accession to every library.

I am, gentlemen, very respectfully yours,
JARED SPARKS.

From Hon. George Bancroft.
New York, Nov. 17, 1855.

Messrs. Childs & Peterson:

Gentlemen:—The examination of articles under the letter A, in Mr. Allibone's Critical Dictionary of British and American Authors, has led me to form a high estimate of the comprehensiveness and the utility of his design, as well as of the fearless and indefatigable industry, the candour, and the general ability with which he is executing it. His work bids fair to take a very high rank in its own peculiar department. His plan has moreover a special attraction, for it not only presents appropriate information respecting each author, but also a general picture of the impression which he may have made on the public and on his critics. I wish the deserved success to this great undertaking, and

Remain, very respectfully yours,
GEORGE BANCROFT.

From Wm. H. Prescott, Esq.
Boston, Aug. 14, 1855.

Gentlemen:—I should sooner have replied to your note requesting my opinion of Allibone's Dictionary of Literature. I have rarely seen so large an amount of matter condensed into so small a compass. The work is conducted on what to me is an entirely novel principle, and presents the reader not simply with the opinions of the author, but with those of the best critics on every writer whose character he discusses. This is opening the best sources of information, while the original contributions of the editor, which connect the extracts together, are of a piquant kind that gives vivacity to the discussion.

The index of subjects will form a sort of catalogue raisonné, that cannot fail to make the book as useful in a bibliographical as in a biographical view. If the rest of the work is as ably executed as that embraced under the first three letters of the alphabet—all I have seen—it cannot fail to be an important contribution to English literature.

I remain, gentlemen, your ob't servant,
W. H. PRESCOTT.

From the Hon. Edward Everett.
Boston, Sept. 20, 1855.

Gentlemen:—I have received the volume you were good enough to send me, containing the first three letters of Mr. Allibone's "Critical Dictionary of English Literature, and British and American Authors, living and deceased." The plan of the work is extremely comprehensive, and requires laborious research in the collection of the materials, and great care and discrimination in putting them together. As far as I have been able to examine the specimen contained in the volume sent me, Mr. Allibone is performing his task with great fidelity and success. In giving, in the words of the authors, the judgments which he cites from approved sources, he has made a great improvement over former biographical dictionaries, which are, for the most part, unacknowledged compilations. Mr. Allibone's work appears to be, to a very unusual degree, the result of original investigation, and, if completed as begun, will, I am confident, be found a most useful work of reference, and an important addition to the literary apparatus of our language. I am, gentlemen, respectfully yours,

EDWARD EVERETT.

Gentlemen:—In judging of this work, it is necessary to keep in mind that the resolute title, "A Critical Dictionary of English Literature," ushers in a work which the author and publishers found themselves obliged to restrict to one volume, containing, nevertheless, "thirty thousand biographies and literary notices." Having myself edited an Encyclopædia Americana, I am better able to give an opinion upon some points than I should have been otherwise; and an examination of many of the larger articles under the letters A, B, and C, has convinced me that the author has brought to his task what may be called the Encyclopædic virtues, in a high degree—a painstaking love of detail and conscientious accuracy, and an unvarying desire of collecting; a self-forgetting disposition to give what others have done, and a certain taste and tact, which, in many cases, alone can draw the proper line of admission and omission. I make no doubt that this work will be a welcome aid to all that handle books—scholars, general readers, and booksellers. Your ob't servant,

FRANCIS LIEBER.

TESTIMONIALS.

From Washington Irving, Esq.

Sunnyside, Aug. 23, 1855.

MESSES. CHILDS & PETERSON:

Gentlemen:—Accept my thanks for the specimen you have sent me of Mr. Allibone's Critical Dictionary of English Literature. The undertaking does honour to that gentleman's enterprise; and the manner in which, from the specimen before me, (464 pages,) he appears to execute it, does honour to his intelligence, perspicuity, wide and accurate research, impartiality, and good taste. When completed, the work cannot fail to be a valuable library companion and family book of reference. The beautiful manner in which the work is got up is highly creditable to American typography.

Very respectfully, gentlemen,

Your obliged and ob't servant,

TO MESSES. CHILDS & PETERSON:

Gentlemen:—The specimen of Mr. Allibone's Critical Dictionary of Authors which you sent me has given me a high idea of the industry, exactness, and various reading of the author. I think it promises to be one of the most valuable works of reference which have been produced in the present century. The plan appears to me excellent, though difficult; but the difficulty has been happily overcome by the author's extraordinary research.

Truly yours, W. C. BRYANT.

From Jared Sparks, LL.D.

Cambridge, Sept. 1, 1855.

Gentlemen:—I have examined, with great satisfaction, the part of Mr. Allibone's Dictionary of English Literature which has already been published, (464 pages.) The plan appears to me an exceedingly good one: comprising, as it does, a notice of all the English and American authors down to the present time, with biographical incidents, an enumeration of their several publications, and frequent critical remarks.

An undertaking so comprehensive in its design requires vast diligence and research. As far as the author has proceeded, he seems to have executed his task with ability, good judgment, and success. When completed, the work cannot fail to be of great utility to all readers who would acquire a knowledge of books, and a most valuable accession to every library.

I am, gentlemen, very respectfully yours,

JARED SPARKS.

MESSES. CHILDS & PETERSON:

Gentlemen:—The examination of articles under the letter A, in Mr. Allibone's Critical Dictionary of British and American Authors, has led me to form a high estimate of the comprehensiveness and the utility of his design, as well as of the fearless and indefatigable industry, the candour, and the general ability with which he is executing it. His work bids fair to take a very high rank in its own peculiar department. His plan has moreover a special attraction, for it not only presents appropriate information respecting each author, but also a general picture of the impression which he may have made on the public and on his critics. I wish the deserved success to this great undertaking, and

Remain, very respectfully yours,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

Gentlemen:—I should sooner have replied to your note requesting my opinion of Allibone's Dictionary of Literature. I have rarely seen so large an amount of matter condensed into so small a compass. The work is conducted on what to me is an entirely novel principle, and presents the reader not simply with the opinions of the author, but with those of the best critics on every writer whose character he discusses. This is opening the best sources of information, while the original contributions of the editor, which connect the extracts together, are of a piquant kind that gives vivacity to the discussion.

The index of subjects will form a sort of catalogue raisonné, that cannot fail to make the book as useful in a bibliographical as in a biographical view. If the rest of the work is as ably executed as that embraced under the first three letters of the alphabet—all I have seen—it cannot fail to be an important contribution to English literature.

I remain, gentlemen, your ob't servant,

W. H. PRESCOTT.

Trübner's Bibliotheca Glottica.

THE LITERATURE OF AMERICAN ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES, by HERMANN E. LUDWIG. With additions and corrections by Professor WM. W. TURNER. Edited by NICOLAS TRÜBNER. London, Trübner & Co., 60, Paternoster Row, 1868. 8vo, fly and general title, 2 leaves; Dr. Ludwig's preface, pp. v.-viii.; the Editor's preface, pp. ix.-xii.; Biographical Memoir of Dr. Ludwig, pp. xiii., xiv.; and INTRODUCTION BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTICES, pp. xv.-xxiv., followed by a list of Contents. Then follow Dr. Ludwig's Bibliotheca Glottica, alphabetically arranged, with additions by the editor, pp. 1-209; Prof. Turner's additions, with those of the editor to the same, also alphabetically arranged, pp. 210-246; Index, pp. 247-256; and list of Errata, pp. 257, 258. One volume, handsomely bound in cloth, price 18s. 6d.

This work is intended to supply a great want, now that the study of ethnology has proved that exotic languages are not mere curiosities, but essential and interesting parts of the natural history

The work has been noticed by the press of both continents, and we may be permitted to refer particularly to the following:

"This work, mainly the production of the late Herr Ludwig, a German naturalized in America, is devoted to an account of the literature of the aboriginal languages of that country. It gives an alphabetical list of the various tribes of whose language any record remains, and refers to the works, papers, or manuscripts in which such information may be found. The work has evidently been a labour of love; and as no pains seem to have been spared by the editors, Prof. Turner and Mr. Trübner, in rendering the work as accurate and complete as possible, those who are most interested in its contents will be best able to judge of the labour and assiduity bestowed upon it by author, editors, and publisher."—Lancet, 5th April, 1868.

"This is the first instalment of a work which will be of the greatest value to philologists, and is a compendium of the aboriginal languages of the American continents, and a digest of all the known literature bearing upon those languages. Mr. Trübner's hand has been engaged postum, and in his preface he lays claim to about one-sixth of the whole; and we have no doubt that the encouragement with which this portion of the work will be received by scholars will be such as to inspire Mr. Trübner with sufficient confidence to persevere in his arduous and most honourable task."—Lancet, 16th Dec. 1867.
